The basic architectural character of this building is English The exceptionly large windows and doors were a typical Southern modification.

The buildings were designed primarily as sleeping rooms rather than centers of family life, providing shelter and little more. Each apartment was originally divided into three long rooms each with its own fireplace. The front room bordering on the main avenue, Monroe Street, served as the gathering point in the apartment. Its width was dictated primarily by a bed's length and pedestrian way. The double hung windows and door transoms originally supplied light into the room which still has the dimly lit atmosphere of its period. The central room was also sleeping quarters and shared a sommon chimney with the main room. The kitchens have been modified with electrical equipment, but the stack from the original fire-place still exists.

The thick masonry walls not only supported the sharply pitched roof but also continued up through the roof structure bisecting the building providing a parapet or fire stop. The masonry sub-structure lifts the building above the ground to enable air circulation below the planked sub floor, and brick vents in the gable provide it through the trussed attic.

The masonry details are cutstanding examples of those used in construction during this period. Common bond or header bond make up all of the solid 12½ thick exterior walls. The window and door lintels are all jack arch lintels, made of voussoirs, or cut brick, in soldier coursing. The window sills are made of simplified headers and a second row of common coursed brick work. The brick cornices and coping are detailed with simple corbelling. The chimneys, which are supplied by as many as four fireplaces, are, also, tepped with several courses of corbelled brick work. The timber used in the sub-fleor, roof trusses, and jambs are large, rough cut pine planks, examples of a material available in quantity during the period. Each window originally had shutters for inclement weather and double hung windows in addition to the view window doors.
