Summary Paragraph
The Cypress Street Schoolhouse is a single-story schoolhouse located in Orange, California, approximately 31 miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles, and 22 miles northeast of Long Beach. It was built in 1931 in the Spanish Colonial Revival Style. It has a stucco exterior with terra cotta shingle details. It has a hipped-roof tower with a quatrefoil decoration, which was added after the Villa Park Orchard Association acquired the building in the 1972. The Schoolhouse was built on a one-acre lot in 1931, as a replacement for an earlier, wooden, two-room, segregated schoolhouse called La Cabertizia (The Barn). It was constructed out of materials from the demolished Lemon Street School down the road. It faces south, and is set close to the north end of the lot. It is comprised of five classrooms, each with cloakrooms just outside, a principal’s office, a nurse’s office, a custodial closet, a tower, women’s and men’s restrooms, and a shower. These rooms were placed around a long, wide corridor with double doors at each end, a loading dock on the rear (north) façade, and a large archway from the principal’s and nurse’s office to the classroom area. The building has lost some historic integrity due to subsequent building modifications but many of its original features were restored by Chapman University between 2004 and 2012. The Cypress Street Schoolhouse now functions as offices for Chapman University’s Early Human and Lifespan Development Research Program.

Narrative Description
The Cypress Street School House “for Mexican children” was built primarily of materials salvaged from the wrecking of the Lemon Street School, razed to provide more playground space for a nearby Intermediate school.1 It is a wood frame building on a raised flooring foundation with a crawl space beneath, built in the Spanish Colonial Revival style. It has a flat roof in the rear and a hipped roof on the front façade, covered with terra cotta roof tiles. Walls are clad in stucco, and, close to the roof, were adorned with triangular terra cotta tile details that remain intact today.

The Cypress Street Schoolhouse’s front (south) façade, features a concrete staircase with simple iron railings leading to a large archway in which the double entry doors are situated. The south façade is one and a half stories tall, covered with white stucco, and features a hipped-roofed tower above the entry and steel frame windows that are a modern interpretation of the original 1931 windows. A new, ADA-compliant ramp is located on the southeast side of the façade. The concrete vault built by the Villa Park Orchard Association during their tenure in the building exists at the southeast corner of the building. The west elevation faces the Santa Fe Railroad train tracks, and features a large aluminum storage shed at the northwest end, as well as terra cotta tile detailing and steel frame windows. The rear façade, the north elevation, features a loading dock with a concrete staircase, and terra cotta tile details. The east façade faces Cypress Street, and features steel frame windows.

Originally, the building featured steel frame windows, a concrete staircase with a cast iron scrollwork railing, and an arched entryway. It was comprised of five “large, well-ventilated” classrooms, each with long, narrow cloakrooms just outside the classroom doors, a principal’s office, a nurse’s office, a custodial closet, a tower, women’s and men’s restrooms, and a shower. These rooms were placed around a long, wide corridor with double doors at each end, a loading dock on the rear (north) façade, and a large archway from the principal’s and nurse’s office to the classroom area. Each of the classrooms had transom windows set close to the ceiling that allowed light in from the central hallway. The restrooms had clerestory windows set close to the ceiling to allow light in from the outside, and the shower was convenient for students who did not have that amenity at their houses in the surrounding Cypress Street Barrio.

In the 1970s, the Villa Park Orchard Association turned the Cypress Street School House into an office building, and, because they managed payroll from these offices, added a concrete vault for money storage onto the east corner of the south (front) façade. They changed the tower’s roofline from a flat roof to a hipped roof, removed a south-facing plate glass window from the tower, and added a quatrefoil in its place. They added lettering around the south arched entryway, and decals of oranges, denoting their place in the citrus industry in Orange. The Villa Park Orchard Association also added walls, dropped ceilings, wood paneling, shag carpeting, and other interior details common to the 1970s to the School House. The steel frame windows were ripped out and replaced with side-sash windows with slatted aluminum awnings. Additionally, the Villa Park Orchard Association added on a large, aluminum storage shed to the northwest corner of the building in the mid-1970s.

When Chapman acquired the Cypress Street School House building in 2004, it was in disrepair. The Villa Park Orchard Association had been using the space primarily as a storage area for years, and the roof leaked extensively. Kris Olsen and his team restored the ceilings to their original height, removed the wood paneling from the walls, removed the shag carpeting and restored the original hardwood floors they found underneath, tore out most walls added by the Villa Park Orchard Association, and generally restored the building to its original footprint. They kept the concrete vault and the aluminum storage unit, and both are now utilized for storage. Chapman’s wall additions in the main corridor and in the classrooms are constructed of materials compatible with the original construction materials, and are potentially removable if necessary for a future adaptive reuse of the space.

Chapman University made modern alterations to the historic site to allow for more heavy traffic of the site, as well as to provide easy entry for handicapped visitors to the building. In search of LEED certification for the site, Kris Olsen and his team implemented several sustainable measures during the rehabilitation process. These included an erosion and sedimentation plan for all construction activities, maximizing on-site open space by the creation of a landscaped front area in place of what was previously pavement, utilizing low flow toilets and faucets with sensing devices, reducing potable water use for landscaping by half, including areas for recycling of paper, corrugated cardboard, glass, plastics, and metals, and providing parking for low emissions fuel vehicles as well as bicycle parking. These efforts among others, including the efforts to retain the original fabric of the structure to maintain the Cypress Street Schoolhouse’s historic integrity, earned Chapman’s adaptive reuse of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse LEED Gold Certification in late 2013.

In its present use as the Psychology department’s Early Human and Lifespan Development Research Program, each of the five classrooms have been divided up into group work areas and individual interview or office spaces. The interview rooms and offices are on the perimeter of the classrooms, and have simple partition walls between them and the group work spaces, which retain the transom windows to the central corridors even in their modern configuration, filled with full-height cubicles. The cloakrooms outside of three of the classrooms now function as storage rooms with mechanical service room tucked away inside of them. One of the other cloakrooms has become a data room and an ADA-accessible restroom, while the last cloakroom was repurposed as part of a laboratory, and also as an office kitchen. The principal’s office and the nurse’s office are both used as conference rooms. The tower space, once used for storage, now houses the building’s HVAC system, which effectively keeps it out of sight and allows the building to retain its historic integrity.

Integrity

Location: The building is in its original location. Design: The Cypress Street Schoolhouse retains many significant character-defining features of its original Spanish Colonial Revival architecture, but has lost some integrity of design. Setting: Features of the original setting are intact, including the relationship of the school with the surrounding single- and multi-family residences, and with North Cypress Street and the railroad tracks. Materials and Workmanship: Although there have been some alterations over time, the Cypress Street Schoolhouse retains the majority of its historic materials, and reflects the physical evidence of period construction Techniques. Feeling: The Cypress Street Schoolhouse retains the significant physical features that convey the building’s character as a 1930s Spanish Colonial Revival schoolhouse. Association: The property continues to convey its historic association with education, and retains significant character-defining features of its original Spanish Colonial Revival design. Limited loss of integrity of design on the primary façade does not preclude eligibility for listing under Criterion A, thus the property retains sufficient integrity for listing in the National Register. See Figure Log for comparative aerial photos showing building footprint is essentially unchanged over time.

8. Statement of Significance

Applicable National Register Criteria
(Mark "x" in one or more boxes for the criteria qualifying the property for National Register listing.)

- A. Property is associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad patterns of our history.
- B. Property is associated with the lives of persons significant in our past.
- C. Property embodies the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction or represents the work of a master, or possesses high artistic values, or represents a significant and distinguishable entity whose components lack individual distinction.
- D. Property has yielded, or is likely to yield, information important in prehistory or history.

Criteria Considerations
(Mark “x” in all the boxes that apply.)

- A. Owned by a religious institution or used for religious purposes
- B. Removed from its original location
- C. A birthplace or grave
- D. A cemetery
- E. A reconstructed building, object, or structure
- F. A commemorative property
- G. Less than 50 years old or achieving significance within the past 50 years

Cultural Affiliation

Architect/Builder
The Cypress Street Schoolhouse is significant under criterion A at the local level of significance for its role in Hispanic ethnic heritage and social history in Orange, California. Its cultural and historic significance is derived from its physical part in the earliest civil rights and anti-segregation movements in the greater Los Angeles area. The building’s period of significance is 1931-1944, from the opening of the school until its closure when the school district was integrated. This property is nominated under the cover of the Latinos in 20th Century California MPS, under the associated context Latino Struggles for Inclusion, as an example of the property type Mexican Schools. This property is mentioned specifically as an example of significant Mexican schools in the MPS text.

Criterion A

The Cypress Street School “for Mexican children”\(^4\) was built in 1931 as a segregated elementary school for the Spanish-speaking children of Mexican and Mexican-American citrus workers in the city of Orange, California. It replaced the c. 1920 wooden, two-room, segregated schoolhouse, called La Cabertizia (The Barn), which existed behind the old Lemon Street School House. The Cypress Street Schoolhouse served children in kindergarten through fifth grade. The Cypress Street School remains the only extant formerly segregated school building in Orange County, California, and may be the only formerly segregated school building still in existence in the state, as most were demolished in the decades following the 1947 Méndez v. Westminster verdict, which outlawed segregated schools throughout the state of California.\(^5\)

Cypress Street Barrio\(^6\)

The Cypress Street Barrio in Orange, California, was formed as a colonia in the late 1910s and early 1920s. During this time, many immigrants moved to Southern California from central Mexico as a result of the Mexican Revolution (1910-1920). The Barrio is bounded by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railway tracks on the west, Maple Avenue on the south, Olive Street on the east, and Rose Avenue on the north. Originally, the Barrio’s inhabitants were employed in area’s citrus industry, with the men working in the fields as citrus pickers, and the women working in the packinghouses as citrus packers. Pickers received up to thirty-five cents per hour, and the packers received forty-five cents per hour. Work was seasonal, and thus many of the workers rented homes in the Barrio while they had work in the area. Many families traveled north to the San Joaquin Valley during the winter to find additional work.

The Barrio was founded on the 400 block of Cypress Street (between Sycamore and Walnut Avenues) and eventually extended north and south along the rail lines, close to the packinghouses where the Barrio’s inhabitants found employment. “Anglos” originally owned the Barrio’s small homes, and rented them to the Mexican-American citrus workers. Over time, the Barrio inhabitants built their own homes or bought existing houses. Today, there are over two hundred historic homes in the Cypress Street Barrio, over eighty of which are listed on the National Register of Historic Places as contributors to the Old Towne Orange Historic District (listed 1997). There are approximately two dozen historic commercial, industrial and public structures located in the Barrio, nearly half of which are listed as contributors to the Old Towne Orange Historic District.

Two distinct Hispanic populations evolved in the Barrio: migrants who rented local homes and traveled throughout the western United States for work, and residents who obtained jobs locally and remained throughout the year. By the 1930s, the Cypress Street Barrio had three schools and two churches, reflecting the area’s growing population.

Segregation in California Schools

The earliest school segregation in California targeted the African-American population beginning in 1854. In the early 1860s, California state laws specifically authorized school districts to provide separate schools for African-American, Native American, and Asian-American children. However, a segregated school could only be established if the parents of at least ten students of a racial minority petitioned a district to build one. If parents failed to do this, their children could be denied a public education altogether. In districts with fewer than ten schoolchildren of a racial minority, students could attend “Anglo” schools, but “Anglo” parents tended to demand a segregated school for non-white students when their numbers increased in the community. These practices were protested following the passage of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. The 1874 court case that followed, Ward v. Flood, affirmed that education was a right for every California citizen, but that using separate facilities for ethnic groups was legal. The California courts upheld this stance in Mamie v. Tape (1884), when a second-generation Chinese student protested that she had fully Americanized and had a right to attend a public school. Japanese immigrants met similar injustices when they arrived in the late 19th century. Their struggle became international news when Japanese diplomats pleaded with President Theodore Roosevelt about the deplorable conditions of the schools in which the immigrants were placed. In the following decades, some integration of Japanese students was allowed, but this progress was derailed during World War II. In the late 1800s, the California legislature established an educational code that legalized the practice of segregating Chinese, Japanese, and Native American students. This educational code did not include Mexican-Americans, as state law never authorized school districts to segregate children of Mexican ancestry. Regardless, school districts segregated them from other students beginning in the early 1910s.

Segregation of Mexicans-Americans in Southern California and especially in Orange County was widespread by the 1920s, as the population of people from Mexico grew along with the local citrus industry. “Anglo” city planners justified segregation by arguing that Mexicans took away important jobs from “Anglo” workers, and by promulgating the racial beliefs that Mexicans did not share the same cultural values of “regular Americans.” School boards validated the creation of separate educational facilities by stating that the students’ inability to speak English made it impossible for them to survive in an “Anglo” classroom. This distinction later influenced “studies” that suggested that Mexican and Mexican-American students were mentally inferior to “Anglos,” and thus could not compete in “Anglo” schools, no matter which language they spoke. School districts rarely if ever tested these hypotheses with any tests of students’ aptitudes. Some districts did not segregate Mexican-American students whose families had been in California for several generations, and thus had accumulated wealth.

By 1927, Mexican-American children made up over ten percent of California’s total school enrollment. As a result, numerous schools were established for the Mexican and Mexican-American schoolchildren. Most schools constructed specifically for Mexican and Mexican-American school children only accommodated elementary and some intermediate schooling. High schools were not commonly constructed, as many children of Mexican descent were expected to drop out of school prior to high school in order to start working in the citrus industry to help support their families. The equality of the educational environment for Mexican-Americans was not the same as their “Anglo” neighbors: a 1928 study by two University of California professors found that the “Mexican” schools were fire hazards, with little ventilation, light, and sanitation.

The lack of equal education and facilities prompted Mexican-American families to fight against segregation in Southern California. In 1931, a state court judge ruled that the Lemon Grove school for Mexican-American children in San Diego, called “The Stable” by its students, was not educationally justified or supported by state law. The judge therefore ordered the Mexican-American children to attend school on an equal basis with the others in the community. This was the first successful school desegregation court ruling in the nation. However, it only applied to Lemon Grove School, and thus other school districts in Southern California continued their segregated practices unhindered.

11 Adapted from Wallace, “Mendez et. al v. Westminster et. al’s Impact.”

Gonzalo Méndez discovered the inequality in California’s school system when, upon moving to Westminster in 1943, he attempted to enroll his children in a local school. He asked his wife’s sister to register his children at the school, but the children were denied enrollment because of their Spanish last name. They were instead sent to the “Mexican” school several miles away. Their cousins, however, gained enrollment in the “Anglo” school, because their father, though of mostly Mexican descent, had a French last name. As a child, Méndez attended the “Anglo” school, Westminster Main. He was furious at the injustice done to his children – they were expected to attend a far inferior school located several blocks from his farm. He took his case to the district office, and later the county, with no success.

Within weeks, Méndez hired attorney David Marcus, who had recently won a segregation suit against a public pool in Riverside, California. In his research, Marcus found that the school districts were breaking state policy, and proposed that they find plaintiffs from other school districts to prove that this was a wide-scale act of discrimination based on surnames and unproven pedagogical studies. Méndez and Marcus drove around neighboring districts, interviewing families about their experiences with the school districts. Finding support initially was difficult. Many parents did not want to risk the repercussions of angering the districts, or were content that their children were able to attend schools close to home. Some were worried that if they spoke out, they would lose their jobs. Other parents, however, began organizing meetings to discuss the topic of litigation. Méndez and Marcus invited Fred Ross, a fieldworker for the American Council on Race Relations, and Hector Tarango, secretary of the Latin American Council and editor of a local Mexican newspaper, to assist them in organizing the local neighborhoods around the petition to end segregation in Orange County. This form of community organization was not a new concept for the Mexican-American neighborhoods, as they had been protesting working conditions for several decades. However, these new community meetings between concerned parents provided an even greater level of political engagement, and became the basis for the national attention received by the Méndez v. Westminster case. The improved Mexican-American activity and interest in the political process proved an asset after the case as well, when the parents challenged the districts to follow through with the court's decision.

When the Méndez v. Westminster case began in July 1945, the highly organized Mexican-American community faced seemingly unbeatable odds. Parents from the other districts signed on to the petition, representing over 5,000 students. Other parents signed on as plaintiffs, namely William Guzmán of Santa Ana, Frank Palomino of Garden Grove, Thomas Estrada of Westminster, and Lorenzo Ramirez of El Modena (a neighborhood since annexed by Orange, California). During the case, Marcus argued that school districts segregated students on the basis of national origin, thus breaking the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. His witnesses explained that their children were segregated based on their surnames and appearances. Representatives from the school districts argued that the Mexican-American students were separated primarily due to a lack of language abilities that rendered them unfit to attend "regular" schools.

On February 18, 1946, United States Judge Paul J. McCormick handed down a landmark court decision, ruling in favor the Mexican-American plaintiffs on the basis that "Spanish-speaking children are retarded in learning English by lack of exposure to its use because of segregation" and that "the methods of segregation prevalent in the defendant school districts [fostered] antagonisms in the children and [suggested] inferiority among them where none exists." Three days later, on February 21, 1946, County Counsel Joel Ogel filed an appeal in response to McCormick's ruling. Correspondence between Ogel and the school districts showed that they planned to go to the United States Supreme Court if necessary. This allowed the districts more time to organize their legal team in order to avoid another loss. The fight against desegregation was far from over, as the districts either refused to desegregate, or found means to prolong desegregation during the months leading up to the appeal.

Despite the efforts of the Orange County school districts to avoid desegregation, their appeal of Judge McCormick's ruling was unsuccessful. On April 14, 1947, the Ninth Federal District Court of Appeals upheld McCormick's ruling. The school districts were given the choice to appeal further to the United States Supreme Court, but none followed this course. Joel Ogle corresponded with the Westminster School District, restating his position that the federal government had no jurisdiction on the issue of segregation in California, and that appealing to the Supreme Court would only further involve the federal government in the issue. Similarly, the Santa Ana School Board discussed the issue of jurisdiction, but decided appeal was not in their best interest. The school districts could wait no longer to comply with McCormick's ruling. However, many school districts in Southern California waited for years after the to desegregate, prolonging segregation in their school districts for as long as possible.

_Schools and Segregation in Orange, California_

In February 1872, A.B. Chapman, one of the founders of Orange, California, set aside 2.5 acres of land for the creation of a school. The parcel was on the southeast corner of North Lemon Street and West Sycamore Avenue. The original school, called the Lemon Street School, was a single-story, two room schoolhouse measuring 24' x 26'. By June 1872, the school had seventy students. In 1874, due to an increase in the school's population, another school building was 16 For example, the Pasadena Unified School District, waited until the late 1960s and early 1970s to officially desegregate, ignoring both the _Mendez v. Westminster_ ruling and the _Brown v. Board of Education_ ruling until three families protested their de facto segregation policies. For more information, see Rebecca L. Smith, Elaine Zorbas, Abby Delman, and Charlotte Krontiris, _Advocates for Change: oral history interviews on the desegregation of the Pasadena Unified School District_, (Pasadena, CA: Pasadena Heritage, 2007).

constructed on North Cypress Street. Other schools were built south of the Orange Plaza (located at Chapman Avenue and Glassell Street) in 1875 and 1886, and two more school buildings were built east of the Plaza in 1880 and 1887. A high school was opened in 1903 at the northeast corner of the intersection of West Palm Avenue and North Glassell Street (where Chapman University is today), and an intermediate school was constructed at the southwest corner of the intersection of West Sycamore Avenue and North Glassell Street in 1914. The Lemon Street School building continued to expand until it was a two-story, multi-room school with a bell tower. In the early 1920s, a two-room schoolhouse for Mexican-American elementary school students, called La Cabertizia (“The Barn”), was built behind the Lemon Street School, marking the beginning of school segregation in Orange.¹⁷

The Lydia D. Killefer School was built at 541 N. Lemon Street as a school for the English-speaking children in the Cypress Street Barrio area. Mexican children able to speak fluent English were allowed to transfer to the Killefer School from the Cypress Street School beginning in 1931, when both schools opened.¹⁹ In 1942, however, the school was officially desegregated.²⁰ With the closing of the Cypress Street School in 1944, three years before the 1947 Méndez v. Westminster verdict, Orange Unified School District voluntarily desegregated its entire district. It was among the first in the state of California to do so. The closing of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse in the early 1940s is particularly significant, as it took place several years prior to the Méndez v. Westminster ruling in 1947 that required schools in Southern California to desegregate.

Cypress Street Schoolhouse

The Cypress Street Schoolhouse “for Mexican children” was built primarily of materials salvaged from the wrecking of the Lemon Street School, razed to provide more playground space for a nearby Intermediate school.²¹ Its Spanish Colonial Revival architectural style is both a product of its period of construction, as well as the intended inhabitants of the building. Despite the fact that the school was a segregated school “for Mexican Children,” it was well-equipped with its five “large, well-ventilated” classrooms, each with long, narrow cloakrooms just outside the classroom doors, a principal’s office, a nurse’s office, a custodial closet, a tower, women’s and men’s restrooms, and a shower.²² These rooms were placed around a long, wide corridor with double doors at each end, a loading dock on the rear (north) façade, and a large archway from the principal’s and nurse’s office to the classroom area. Each of the classrooms had transom windows set close to the ceiling that allowed light in from the central hallway. The restrooms had clerestory windows set close to the ceiling to allow light in from the outside, and the shower was convenient for students who did not have that amenity at their houses in the surrounding Cypress Street Barrio.

¹⁷ After finishing elementary school, all sixth- through ninth-grade students, regardless of race, matriculated to the intermediate school at the southwest corner of West Sycamore Avenue and North Glassell Street. Though most Hispanic students quit school to work in the fields, some matriculated with their fellow students. However, after intermediate school, very few Hispanic students attended high school.

¹⁸ At that time, most, if not all, English-speaking children in Orange were white.

The Cypress Street Schoolhouse remains the only extant segregated school building in Orange County, California. In fact, it may be the only segregated school building still in existence in the state, since most were torn down in the decades following the 1947 Méndez v. Westminster verdict, in which a California judge outlawed segregated schools throughout the state. The fact that the Schoolhouse was well-constructed and well-ventilated was unusual for segregated schoolhouses in Southern California. In fact, “a 1928 study by two University of California professors found that [segregated] schools were fire hazards with little ventilation, light, and sanitation. In the years following Mendez [v. Westminster], many of these schools had to be torn down because they did not meet the proper state requirements for building safety.”[^23] The Cypress Street Schoolhouse quality construction and good natural lighting and ventilation may be the reason why it is still standing — and in use — today.

During its restoration of the Cypress Street School House, Chapman placed plaques above each classroom and office door, inscribed with the names of the teachers who taught or worked in the school while the building operated as the Cypress Street School. The Orange Barrio Historic Society, integral in the rehabilitation process, now has a conference room and small exhibit space in the school building, located in the former principal’s office. They replaced the 1970s windows installed by the Villa Park Orchard Association with historically compatible yet modern steel-frame windows, removed non-original doorways, repaired water damage in the ceilings and walls, replaced the broken panes of the roof window in the central hallway, removed wallpaper added in the 1970s, and repainted the walls three shades of historically compatible colors. Additionally, they installed salvaged or architecturally compatible schoolhouse light fixtures inside the building, and installed a stylistically compatible pendant light in the entryway.

Cypress Street Schoolhouse
Orange, Orange County, California
National Register of Historic Places

The Cypress Street Schoolhouse is a single-story schoolhouse constructed in 1931 and designed in the Spanish Colonial Revival style, with stucco exterior and architectural detail in terra cotta tiles. It has a hipped roof tower with quatrefoil decoration, added in 1972. The building consists of five classrooms with cloakrooms, a principal's office, nurse's office, custodial closet, tower, restrooms, and shower, located along a long corridor.

The property is eligible for the National Register at the local level of significance under Criterion A for its association with Orange County's Latino community, functioning as a segregated school for Mexican children between 1931 and 1944. The property is nominated under the cover of the Latinos in 20th Century California Multiple Property Submission, under the associated context Latino Struggles for Inclusion, as an example of the property type Mexican Schools. This building is mentioned specifically as an example of a significant Mexican school in the MPS. The building replaced a 1920s two-room schoolhouse called La Cabertizia (The Barn) until integration of the local school district made this building redundant. Segregated schools were outlawed following the 1947 Mendez v. Westminster verdict.

The property's primary façade has undergone some alteration, including creation of a new hipped roof and addition of two small shed-roofed additions to the building, but the property retains sufficient historic integrity for listing in the National Register under Criterion A.

The nomination was submitted by a third party on behalf of the property owner, and has received three letters of support. A fourth letter received by the Office of Historic Preservation regarding another nominated party, the Killefer School (also nominated under the Latinos in California MPS) argued for the significance of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse and is included as a second letter of support.

Staff supports the nomination as written and recommends that the State Historical Resources Commission determine that the Cypress Street Schoolhouse meets National Register Criterion A at the local level of significance with a period of significance of 1931-1944, meeting the requirements of the Latinos in 20th Century California Multiple Property Submission. Staff recommends the State Historic Preservation Officer approve the nomination for forwarding to the National Park Service for listing in the National Register of Historic Places.

Subject: Cypress Street Schoolhouse National Register Nomination, Orange

Dear Dr. Roland-Nawi:

The City of Orange is pleased to support the designation of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse (544 N. Cypress Street, Orange) in the National Register of Historic Places (National Register). In 1931, the Schoolhouse was constructed as a segregated elementary school for the Spanish-speaking children of Mexican and Mexican-American citrus workers living in the Cypress Street Barrio in Orange. By 1944, the Schoolhouse had closed, marking the end of segregation in the Orange Unified School District, three years before the landmark Mendez v. Westminster court ruling officially desegregating schools in California.

We are fortunate to still have a small group of individuals who grew up in the Cypress Street Barrio and attended the Cypress Street School as members of our community. They have shared their experiences as students, and provided valuable insight into the evolution of civil rights in the City of Orange. The school stands as an icon of their youth and the Mexican immigrant experience in Orange. As a testament to this, Chapman University has dedicated a meeting room in the Schoolhouse to the Orange Barrio Historical Society for its meetings.

The Schoolhouse may be one of the only remaining formerly segregated school buildings in California, and it is critical to our collective understanding of the history of segregation in the state. Designation of the Schoolhouse in the National Register acknowledges the fact of past segregation and honors the path toward greater inclusion and equality for the families of the Cypress Street Barrio.

The City of Orange concurs with the findings of the nomination and recommends that the Schoolhouse meets the criteria for designation under the historic context “Latino Struggles for Inclusion” in the Latinos in 20th Century California Multiple Property Submission. The Cypress Street Schoolhouse is an important part of our heritage, worthy of designation in the National Register.

Sincerely,

Teresa “Tita” Smith
MAYOR
Subject: Cypress Street Schoolhouse National Register Nomination

Dear Dr. Roland-Nawi,

The Orange Barrio Historical Society (OBHS) supports the nomination of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse located at 544 North Cypress Street in Orange, California for inclusion in the National Register of Historic Places. The schoolhouse opened in 1931 as a segregated elementary school for Mexican-American children of the area.

Dedicated to collecting and celebrating the contributions of Mexican-American citizens in the city of Orange, OBHS has long had an interest in the Cypress Street Schoolhouse. For twelve years OBHS has worked tirelessly to preserve the historic value of the school. Chapman University joined us in these efforts once they acquired the building.

Chapman University has been instrumental in the restoration and preservation of the building, making sure to include space for our group and any of those interested in the history of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse as well as the neighborhood. The restored building has a dedicated meeting room for OBHS which houses a small, museum like collection of memorabilia and photographs that capture the history of the school. These items have been compiled by past alumni, friends of the project, and OBHS members.

On a personal note, my wife of sixty-four years grew up in the neighborhood, on Cypress Street, and attended the school. As such, the restoration of the building that was closed seventy-one years ago was important to both of us on a personal level.

The board and membership of OBHS is proud to support the efforts to elevate the Cypress Street School to National Historic Registry Status. It is truly a legacy for future generations and an important part of American history.

Sincerely,

Leo M. Castro

Regarding: Cypress Street Schoolhouse National Register Nomination, Orange

Dear Dr. Roland-Nawi:

The Old Towne Preservation Association very much supports the nomination of the Cypress Street Schoolhouse (544 N. Cypress Street, Orange) to be included in the National Register of Historic Places. The Schoolhouse was built in 1931 and used as segregated elementary school for the children of Mexican and Mexican American citrus workers living in this section of Orange. The school was closed in 1944, ending segregation in the Orange Unified School District. It is worthy to note that this was 3 years before the Mendez v. Westminster ruling that officially ended segregation in California schools.

There are a few individuals still living in the city of Orange who attended the Cypress Street School. By their sharing their experiences we all have a better understanding the reality of the time and the progress made for Civil Rights in our Community. Due to the efforts of Chapman University and others, The Cypress Street Schoolhouse stands as a monument to the Mexican immigrant experience in Orange. Chapman University has dedicated a meeting room in the Schoolhouse to the “Orange Barrio Historical Society” for its meetings.

The Old Towne Preservation Association agrees with this nomination and we strongly suggest that the Cypress Street Schoolhouse meets the criteria for designation under the historic context “Latino Struggles for Inclusion” in the “Latinos in the 20th Century California Multiple Property Submission”. We believe that the Cypress Street Schoolhouse is and important part of California and Orange history and truly deserves to be included in the National Register.

Sincerely,

Sandy Quinn
President of The Old Towne Preservation Association
Dear Ms. Coontz,

Thank you for your letter of September 17, 2014 in which you discuss the historical significance of Cypress Elementary School. The Office of Historic Preservation welcomes nominations from individuals and organizations for all properties that qualify for the National Register of Historic Places and/or the California Register of Historical Resources. We are certainly interested to know more about Cypress Elementary School. The nomination of Killefer School in no way precludes a nomination for Cypress Elementary.

It was very nice speaking with you on the telephone.

Sincerely,

Jay

REQUEST TO DESIGNATE KILLEFER SCHOOL AS A HISTORIC PRESERVATION SITE

Gentlemen:

I recently read in the local paper that OLD TOWNE PRESERVATION ASSOCIATION has contacted you to obtain the official designation of Killefer school in Orange as a historic preservation site. As someone who has successfully promoted historic preservation for many years, long before OTPA came into being, I was really surprised at their request. I want you to know, too, that I have been a member of OTPA since its inception.

What is surprising to me is that neither OTPA nor your office has recognized the premier architecturally significant elementary school in the hispanic barrio which really should be on the State Register, and that is the CYPRESS ELEMENTARY SCHOOL, situated at 544 No. Cypress in the City of Orange. CYPRESS ELEMENTARY SCHOOL was segregated until sometime during WWII, when it was closed and the students were transferred to Killefer School at 541 N. Lemon St. The building, built in 1928 is the last remaining segregated schoohouse in California. Chapman University purchased the CYPRESS elementary school site, beautifully restored the historic building and reopened it in March of this year with a community event. The building houses Chapman's Lifespan Development Research Program and Chapman pays tribute the buildings historical past with photographs from its schoohouse era, and by providing space for the for the use of the Orange Barrio Historical Society, composed of descendants of the disappearing barrio.
During all the many years that Chapman University has successfully purchased property for new university sites, OTPA has not expressed interest or involvement, even though the properties are included in the Old Town Orange Historical District.

Our History Room in the Main Orange Library has a huge collection of material regarding the Cypress St. Barrio, including photos of men from the area who volunteered in our wars, recollections individuals who attended the segregated school, and stories of those who worked in the citrus packing houses.

In closing, the people of the barrio, I'm sure, would rather see you designate the CYPRESS STREET SCHOOL as an important historical site, for that is where people in the community felt the greater discrimination by our community.

Sincerely,

Joanne Coontz
