DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE The Bank of Starbuck is located near the center of a quiet agricultural village on the Tucannon River in southeastern Washington. Surrounded by rolling ranch and wheatlands that drop steeply to the Snake River canyon to the north, Starbuck is no longer the bustlin railroad terminal that it once was. The Bank is one of several brick commercial structures dating from the turn-of-the-century which remain standing along the shaded downtown streets Vacant lots and remnants of the once-prosperous business district, as well as some recently constructed residences and house trailers, occupy neighboring blocks. The bank itself faces west, at the northeast corner of Main and McNeil Streets.

The Bank of Starbuck is generally believed to have opened for business in July of 1904. The little brick structure possesses a quiet dignity typical of the institutional architecture of small towns in the developing West. It is a modest building, rectangular in plan, with simple classical details. The bank is one story in height and rests on a cement foundation. Its flat roof is encircled by a parapet with a decorative entablature on the west and south street facades.

The bank is distinguished chiefly by its arched openings on the west and south elevations. These openings are accentuated by moulded, cast stone surrounds and sills. Wooden window enframements, sash, and awning hardware remain intact, as do the doors and their movable transoms. The formal entrance to the bank, on Main Street, is itself recessed within an arched entryway. On the same elevation is a broad semi-circular arched window which has been partially boarded up.

The red brick wall surfaces of the bank's exterior contrast with its grey, cast-stone trim. Both the projecting corner pilasters and the horizontal string course below the entablature are constructed of brick-dimensioned cast stone. A cornice with mutules, egg-and-dart mouldings and a dentil course, as well as a plain frieze and tripartite architrave, are also formed of cast stone-work.

The interior of the bank has been somewhat modernized in recent years to serve as a meeting house and City Hall for the town of Starbuck. These alterations include a lowered ceiling and two newly surfaced walls. Elements of woodwork which have survived untouched include floors, five-panel doors, transoms, and surrounds, baseboards and chair rails - all stained and varnished. To the rear of the public banking room is the vault, still intact, and an adjoining office or storage area which can be entered from McNeil Street.

The Bank of Starbuck remains in relatively sound condition although it is suffering somewhat from infrequent use and lack of maintenance. It is architecturally the most sophisticated of the town's surviving commercial structures, and thus best symbolizes the zenith of Starbuck's importance as a railroad terminus.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Bank of Starbuck is significant to the tiny community as one of the few commercial structures surviving from Starbuck's railroad era. Although architecturally the bank is not an unusually outstanding specimen, it is a fine example of a type: the small town bank of the American West. Permanent banks of this sort were erected when a town achieved a certain degree of stability, and when all promise of continued prosperity looked particularly bright. But, like many rapidly-built western towns founded upon a single economic base, Starbuck declined just as rapidly in wealth and population when the railroad was removed. The visible remains of that era are few, and modern intrusions dating from the 1960's construction of nearby Little Goose Dam are infringing on the town's turn-of-the-century atmosphere. The Bank is thus both a physical and symbolic tie to Starbuck's colorful past.

Starbuck in fact owes its very existence to the coming of the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company. Previously, the townsite had been traversed by white men packing supplies between Walla Walla and the Blackfoot mines in Idaho. Furthermore, settlers had been gradually infiltrating the Tucannon River Valley since the 1860's. It was not until 1882 when the O. R. & N. Company constructed its main line through the area, and erected a warehouse and sectionhouse on the site, that the settlement of Starbuck materialized. The town was named for one Colonel Starbuck, a stockholder of some renown in the O. R. & N. Cc The railroad employees at the small station had immediate need for a store and a blacksmit shop, thus the birth of the town.

In 1886, a branch line of the O. R. & N. Co., was laid from Pomeroy to the main line at Starbuck. Employed on the construction project were some 300 white men and 400 Chinese. A thriving business in the transport of agricultural products developed along this branch line, and Starbuck's boom period then began in earnest. The railroad continued to expand its facilities. By 1890, the Starbuck station included a roundhouse with seven stalls, a machine shop, forge, turntable, sandhouse, two section houses, an agent's house, depot and telegraph office. Approximately eighty local men worked in the railroad's shops and yards. Starbuck functioned not only as a service center for locomotives, but also as a freight and passenger division point. The growth of this industry inspired the construction of two hotels, a schoolhouse, a saloon, and numerous commercial enterprises.

Like other western towns built of wood, Starbuck suffered the ravages of fire in its early years. In 1887, the entire business district was destroyed. In 1893, a fire demolished all of the railroad's facilities, as well as trains and shipments of coal and oil. Becaus it was supported by a steady railroad payroll, however, Starbuck was not as severely affec ed by the economic hardships of 1893-1896. The townsite was officially platted by Mr. Mary McIntosh on June 1, 1894. Wooden's Addition to the town of Starbuck was filed in 1897. A correspondent for the Columbia Chronicle of Dayton reported on December 28, 1895:

A week ago last Friday business called me to Starbuck, and although I am quite a frequent visitor to that thriving little burg, I am always surprised by seeing new buildings under construction. Seven years ago there was not more than ten houses in the town, and no church building, and but a shabby little country school building. Now there are at least 150 dwellings, mostly cottages of modest design. The Presbyterians have a nice church building. The Methodists are erecting a church.

In the early years of the 20th Century Starbuck came of age and grew to be the second largest town in all of Columbia County. A commercial bank was opened in 1904. In 1906, the town incorporated with a population of 400. Starbuck's growth continued to be associated with the railroad. Lyman's History of Old Walla Walla County, published in 1918, contains this rosy description of Starbuck's progress:

Within the decade following incorporation, Starbuck has increased in population from about four hundred to about seven hundred and fifty. The increased railroad force and added buildings in connection with division headquarters has made substantial increases in business, and at the present the metropolis of the Tucanon is a busy, bustling little city, with a fine school building, several churches, a flourishing bank, a number of stores, and many pleasant homes embowered in trees.

Not long after this decade of prosperity, however, Starbuck's decline began. In 1922, the station was discontinued as a district terminal. In 1930 and 1932, terminal service for trainmen and for passengers was ended. The Oregon-Washington Railroad and Navigation Company was absorbed by the Union Pacific in 1936, and use of the machine shop and round-house in Starbuck was subsequently discontinued. These structures were dismantled in 1940, signaling a major turning point in Starbuck's history. It was not until the mid-1960's with the construction of Little Goose Dam on the Snake River, and accompanying railroad and road relocation, that Starbuck received a much-needed economic stimulus. These projects brought in new families, and resulted in the appearance of trailer courts and the opening of a few new businesses. In spite of the influx, Starbuck remains today a small and peaceful village, relatively safe in its physical isolation from the threat of unwanted development.

Little has been discovered concerning the history of the Starbuck Bank itself. It is generally thought to have opened in 1904, and was for a time known as the E. A. Mears Bank. Almost immediately after its opening trouble began. Late in July of 1904, W.C. Barkalow, Cashier, left town for the east and a substantial shortage in the accounts was discovered soon afterward. The Bank was forced into temporary closure. Barkalow was later arrested in St. Paul, Minnesota, but the outcome of his crime is unknown. Until the early 1930's the bank served the citizens of Starbuck. A description of the business in the Columbia Chronicle of December 26, 1923, hints at the prosperity of the operation:

The Bank of Starbuck is housed in a one-story brick structure of ample dimensions to attend to the ever-increasing demands of a modern banking service.

Shortly after its final closure in the early 1930's, the bank building was taken over by the City for use as a City Hall. It continues in this capacity to the present day.
