Theme(s): Vernacular Architecture

Subtheme(s) Function: Residential

The John M. Duncan House is an early example of a vernaculr farm residence built of limestone. It is the only extant single cell house with raised basement and entrance to the side of the gable front. Notable features include the use of very large unsquared rubble and uncoursed broken bond which give an almost wave like appearance to the grapevine joints.

The 12' x 13' one story gabled house is constructed of locally quarried rubble limestone. The west public facade has a door centered under the eaves. The north gabled main facade has a door on the left with steps up to the main floor and one on the right with steps down to the raised basement. The east and south facades each have a small basement window and no other openings.

All facades are constructed of very large unsquared rubble. Quoins and jambs are also large unsquared pieces of rubble. Stonework is uncoursed with broken bond and grapevine joints. Lintels are dimension stone with draft lines, margin lines and finished with a tool with a small round end. The recessed doors are paneled with a single wide board at the top and each side of the reveal. There are no transoms. The only windows are small ones in the raised basement which have wood lintels. Overhanging eaves and verges have closed mitred soffits, and the boards against the stone are also mitred. The interior of the raised basement has grapevine tooled joints and is whitewashed, perhaps to simulate the plastering of the more expensive houses. The house is sited toward the road, but at a long distance from it.

The house is a one room version of the raised basement design used by David Harris, but the stonework indicates that it was not built by him.

Theme(s): Early Settlement

Daniel Chenowith obtained patent deed to the land in 1850. In 1866 John M. Duncan bought it from Canada Fink. By 1875 Duncan had built the house on the 40 acre farm.
