Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Situated on an approximate ten-acre tract of rural land located about one mile east of State Highway 27 at Rockport, Mississippi, the Alford-Little House is a one-story frame residence set upon brick foundation piers. The gable roof is pierced by one interior brick chimney, and an outside-end brick chimney, which breaks away from the house at the attic level, is located on the northwesterly side elevation. The northeasterly facade of the house is fronted by a gallery cut under the front slope of the roof. The gallery is supported by molded and bracketed box columns which are linked by an unusual jigsaw railing. Originally, the house was a five-bay cottage with an open passage, or what is regionally called a "dog-trot," occupying the centermost bay. Not long after the house was constructed, a three-bay side addition was added to the southeasterly elevation. A two-room wing with gallery, which projects perpendicularly from the rear wall, could either be original or more likely contemporary with the three-bay side addition. The "dog-trot" opening was enclosed earlier in the twentieth century on the front and rear elevations by a matching arrangement of an infill of matched boards with a partially glazed door surrounded by transom and sidelights over molded and fielded panels. The facade of the house is finished in matched boards with a molded base, and the three-bay extension and "dog-trot" enclosure are defined by a vertical board at the points of junction. All window and door openings feature unmolded surrounds, the windows are filled with six-over-six, double-hung sash, and the center-bay door opening of the three-bay side addition is filled with a four-paneled and molded door. The interior is basically a double-pile plan with central passage that features a one-room side addition and a two-room rear wing. All interior walls and ceilings are finished with matched boards, the bases are molded, the connecting doors are four-paneled and molded, and the closet doors are board-and-batten. All original wooden pilastered mantel pieces have survived. The most interesting vernacular feature of the house is the semi-circular arched opening into the dining room. The integrity of the house is outstanding and includes the survival of most of the original interior painting scheme and the original hardware.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Alford-Little House is one of Mississippi's distinctive residential essays in the vernacular architectural tradition. Constructed originally as a double-pile "dog-trot" at an indeterminate date, the house was subsequently enlarged and remodeled. The significance of the house derives principally from its vernacular features, some of which may be unique to the house, and from its high degree of architectural integrity. Unusual vernacular features are the flat balusters of the jigsaw gallery railing and the semi-circular arched opening that provides access to the dining room. The integrity of the house is outstanding as the house has remained almost untouched since achieving its final form in the 1870's. All original millwork is intact, the original hardware has survived, and most of the rooms retain their original paint colors. The house gains added significance from its association with the locally prominent Alford family. The house was either constructed or remodeled for Dr. James T. Alford who purchased the property in 1874. Dr. Alford was both a practicing physician and a merchant of the small Rockport community. During most of the twentieth century, the house was the property of the Little family. Mr. and Mrs. Tam Etheridge purchased the house in 1980 and their sympathetic approach to the restoration of the house insures its future integrity.
