DESCRIPTION

Set deep in the woods on the main park road in Devil's Hopyard State Park, this stone-arch bridge, finished in 1937, spans 24 feet crossing an unnamed brook. It is built of local fieldstone set in concrete-based mortar, with most of the pieces rounded in shape like cobbles. The bridge's overall length is 38 feet and the roadway width is 22 feet. The arch is elliptical in form, with its springing point some 7 feet above the base of the spandrels and its crown about 13 feet above the brook; the sides of the opening are slanted inward, creating a slight "keyhole" shape. The spandrels extend about 3 feet above the roadway to form simple parapets capped by concrete coping; the parapets are continued along the roadway as railings for about 30 feet in each direction.

In a recent rehabilitation, the bridge's roadway and fill were excavated, a concrete slab poured over the arch, and a woven-glass waterproof membrane applied over the concrete before the roadway was restored. The stonework was also repointed. These changes had little or no effect on the bridge's appearance.

SIGNIFICANCE

This bridge has historical significance as a product of the New Deal work-relief programs of the 1930s and architectural significance as a typical example of rustic park architecture. Like many other park-related construction projects of the era (in Connecticut and elsewhere), this bridge and two others built at the same time on Devil's Hopyard Road all exhibit the self-consciously rustic construction of the period, characterized by rough-finished cobblestone masonry and the use of an archaic masonry-arch form.

The Connecticut Park and Forest Commission prepared plans for this road in 1930, but limited funds and the suspension of all state capital projects prevented construction work from going forward. The New Deal's Civilian Conservation Corps adopted this project in 1933, and within two years completed the grading of 1.5 miles of roadway and began work on one of the bridges before funding ran out. Then the federal Works Progress Administration picked up the bridge portion of the project, and by the end of 1936 had completed one bridge except for the retaining walls for the approaches, built another up to the spring line of the arch, and finished the abutments on the third. The W.P.A. finished all the bridges in 1937, but the state had yet to finish the road, which took several more years to complete.
