The Robinson House and adjoining Blockhouse, often collectively called Naaman's, stand on a 1.2 acre plot in a rapidly developing commercial--industrial neighborhood, with a small shaded lawn and a paved parking lot. They comprise a group of connecting structures. painted white, some of stone and some frame, erected at different periods. The Robinson House is two-storey and attic, with dormer The eastern end, of stone, was erected about 1723. windows. The western portion of somewhat later date, is of wide, smoothly matched ship lapped) with flush joints. To this has been added, still later. (c. 1915) a portico with fluted Doric columns and a recent onestorey enclosed porch. There have been many interior changes. The main floor retains much fine original woodwork. A modern onestorey frame section now connects an originally separate one-storey stone dependency and the Blockhouse with the main house.

The Blockhouse, believed built in 1654 is a small square twostorey building. The first floor originally had no windows other than loopholes under the eaves. There is a narrow stairway to the upper room. A fireplace almost fills the east wall. Other than probably renewal of the roof and cutting of small windows, the structure is considered to be in its original condition.

The surrounding country has changed beyond recognition. Once a center of waterpowered mills set in farmed country at a wellknown bridge on the King's Highway, later Philadelphia Pike, it now has a steel mill in the immediate area and is developing as a major interchange on I-95 with accompanying commercial expansion and, nearby, greatly increased population pressure with widely varied classes of housing within a short distance.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Blockhouse may be the oldest surviving building in Delaware. Johan Rising, in October 1654, selected a site on Naaman's Creek for a sawmill, the Colony's first in which blades newly brought from Sweden were to be installed the following spring. The Swedes customarily fortified their industrial installations, especially those equipped with imported implements. In September 1655, the Swedes were defeated by a Dutch expedition. Architects find the Blockhouse structurally compatible with such a history and purpose.

From the middle seventeenth century the immediate vicinity of the Robinson House has been a significant milling center. In 1701 a gristmill across the King's Highway was a landmark in the survey of the circular boundary now dividing Delaware and Pennsylvania. The mills and their supporting lands, including the Robinson House site, was purchased by a merchant, Thomas Robinson, in the period 1745-1751 and remained in his family about a century, the House being the home of the successive owners. It'is an architecturally fine building.

Abraham Robinson, owner during the Revolution, was a brotherin-law of Anthony Wayne, who visited him there. Washington is known to have stopped on August 25, 1777, when the Army, moving to meet Howe, encamped nearby. The Robinson Mills were among those dismantled at Washington's order to prevent their use by the British. A later Thomas Robinson was a Major General of Delaware Militia from 1807 through the War of 1812. Some sources state that the Robinson House was an inn through much of the eighteenth and nineteenth century. It housed a fine restaurant from the early twentieth century until shortly before its purchase by the State of Delaware.
