DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Santa Fe Federal Building was completed in 1922 from plans prepared in 1920 by the Treasury Department. The main facade of the building is 187' and the building is 96' deep. The structure consists of a partial basement which is used for mechanical equipment and storage, a ground floor which was originally the post office, and a second floor which was used for offices. The design of the building is the Pueblos style which copies the design elements of the Indian adobe house. The main facade of the structure is one story with nine foot wide covered walkways surrounding open courtyards and connecting the structural elements to each other. Two open courts, each 38' square, are on either side of a two story central wing. The courts are flanked by one story projecting wings at each of the side elevations of the building. The plan is symmetrical about the east west axis and the main facade faces east.

The concrete frame building is faced with brick and covered with stucco to simulate the mud plastering of the true adobe structure. Wood beams in the interior ceilings lie below the poured slab of the floor above. Windows throughout the building are wood casement. Detailing of the structure is careful to represent the adaption of the early adobe buildings of the area with projecting round log vigas, rounded parapet, and walls with blunt angles. The building adapts itself well to the overall streetscape of the city.

The plans prepared by the Treasury Department in 1920 for the new post office at Santa Fe carefully took into consideration the character of the city as expressed through its architecture. At a period when most federal buildings were being designed in the classic styles, this structure employed the Pueblo architectural style. Because the adjacent buildings are one story adobe or stuccoed structures, the post office design employs the architectural elements of scale and the fabric of the surrounding structures by the introduction of a nine foot covered walkway across the front of the building surrounding each of two open courtyards. The interplay of one and two story elements, flat foofs, rounded parapets, small towers and varying ceiling heights are successful attempts to imitate the pueblo dwellings of the Indians. The main facade of the building is broken by the rhythm of the columns which further enhances the scale of the building and its relationship to the surrounding native structures.

The original post office facilities have been removed from the structure but the building continues to serve as office space for federal offices and is a valuable element in the overall fabric of the architectural style and flavor of the city.
