Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The single pen slave cabin conforms to the general description under property type "Resources Associated With Plantation Community Life" and property subtype "Slave Cabins."

The agricultural features, including ricefields, canals, dikes, and trunks, conform to the general description under the property type "Agricultural Features Associated With Rice Cultivation." The features at Keithfield are particularly intact, the fields, canals (including the remnants of a brick-lined canal), dikes, and trunks having been maintained in the same locations since the antebellum period.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The slave cabin (c. 1830) is significant as one of the few known extant slave cabins in Georgetown County; the agricultural features are significant as exceptionally intact examples of historic ricefields; both are significant for their association with Keithfield, which was one of several productive rice plantations on the Black River. It was named for John Keith, one of its early owners. Keith served in the South Carolina Senate and as a militia officer in the War of 1812. Keithfield eventually passed into the hands of James Heyward Trapier, who bought it in 1853. Trapier was a West Point graduate who had resigned from the United States Army five years before he acquired Keithfield to plant rice there and at Windsor, also on the Black River. In 1860 the plantation produced 315,000 pounds of rice with 81 slaves. It also ran a steam-powered pounding mill which pounded 160,000 bushels of rough rice and produced 8000 barrels of clean rice. At the outbreak of the Civil War Trapier helped develop the defenses of Charleston Harbor, and for this service was promoted to brigadier general in the Confederate States Army in October 1861. After service in Florida and Mississippi he returned to Georgetown as commander of the Military District of Georgetown and remained there for the remainder of the war. After Trapier's death in December 1865 Keithfield was held by his estate. One of the most serious of the postwar uprisings led by freedmen on Georgetown County rice plantations occurred there in the spring of 1866. The freedmen left the ricefields, refused to work, and threatened the plantation manager with axes, hoes, and sticks, pelting him with bricks and rocks. They finally forced him to jump in the Black River and swim to the other side. John P. Hazzard was perhaps the most significant postwar owner of Keithfield; he planted rice there from his acquisition of the plantation in 1885 until a series of storms forced him to stop growing it commercially in 1906. Rice was planted at Keithfield, by blacks renting portions of the plantation from Hazzard and selling their rice to merchants in Georgetown, until c. 1920. The original main house burned in the mid-twentieth century.(1)
