Two-story white frame structure with lap-siding, designed by architect David Lesley and built about 1630, exact date unknown. Four square columns support a pedimented front portico, two stories high and extending access central section of house. Ornamental supports are entablative features. Beneath pediment is small second-story balcony with wooden latifocupre. A floor-length window opens onto main portico on either side of front door, original shutters on these and all windows. In addition to the imposing front entrance, two simpler entrances with piazzas open on each side of house. The corners of the house are accented by pilasters. Square chimneys have paneled sides. Of the original separate buildings — which included carriage house, smokehouse, well house, cow barn milk house and kitchen — only the kitchen remains. This building, with its large brick fireplace and iron crane for cooking-utensils, is in good condition.

Characterizing the interior are high ceilings and spacious rooms. The main entrance is a central great hall with an Adam fanlight. A drawing room opens on each side. In antebellum times, the wide double doors to each of these rooms permitted use of the entire front area as a ballroom.

Craft characteristics of the builder show up consistent in the wood trim, design of doors and other architecture features. All floors — wide boards of heart pine — are original, as are the simply-carved mantels. The two drawing rooms and the dining feature central ceiling medallions and original crystal chandeliers. The drawing room doors are fitted with heavy silver hinges imported from England. At the rear of the central hall a narrow-railed staircase rises to a broad landing.

The house is completely furnished with Southern antiques of the antebellum era. These include furniture, silver, crystal, rugs, miniatures and family portraits in elaborately carved gold-leaf frames. Also in gold leaf are floor-to-ceiling pier mirrors and window valances. A first-floor bedroom and four upstairs bedrooms are completely furnished in the early 19-century mode. Marble-topped dressers, hand-carved chests and tester beds with hand-made coverings are typical. The desk of the home's first owner stands in the upstairs hall. Much of the charm and value of the house lies in the authenticity and charm of its furnishings.

The gardens were designed originally by an English landscaper named Johnson. The narrow entrance driveway, originally a carriage road, circles before the front steps. Here an old dismount stone still stands. Remaining from the original landscaping, boxwood-bordered walks extend from the broad piazzas at the side and rear of the house. The house and grounds are shaded by tall oaks, magnolias, cedars. Plantings include oleanders, wygelia, wistaria, other old-fashioned shrubs and flowers.

The house is in excellent condition, both the interior and exterior almost completely unchanged from the original.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Burt House has its chief historic significance as the location of Jefferson Davis's last Council of War.

Here, at the home of his personal friend, Major Armistead Burt, President Davis and his official company stopped overnight, May 2, 1865. The stop was one of many made by the evacuating Confederate government following General Lee's withdrawal from Petersburg, Virginia, and the ensuing Confederate surrender at Appomattox, April 9, 1865. Accompanying Davis from Richmond were members of the Confederate cabinet, his personal staff and departmental attaches. They were attended by Confederate Cavalry

By the time the party reached Abbeville, two of the Cabinet had resigned, the military situation appeared hopeless, and the hope of President Davis to reach Mississippi and re-vitalize Confederate forces appeared equally hopeless.

Attending the Burt House Council of War, in addition to the one cabinet officer not serving as a general, were President Davis, Gen. Ferguson of Mississippi, Generals Dibrell and Vaughan of Tennessee, Col. W.C.P. Breckinridge and Gen. Basil Duke of Kentucky, Gen. John C. Breckinridge, cavalry commander, and Gen. Bragg, senior General of the Army (Lee, Johnston and Beauregard having surrendered).

Here was made the decision to "abandon all hope of effecting any other purpose than Mr. Davis's escape to the west."

It was this final meeting of Confederate leaders which gives substance to Abbeville's claim of being the "Grave of the Confederacy" as well as its "Birthplace" (because of its historic Secession Hill site). As the setting for the final Council of War, the Burt House itself has become a historic landmark.

The Burt House is also considered extremely valuable as an example of antebellum mansion architecture and atmosphere. Both its exterior and interior appearance typify the period known popularly as the "Old South."

Built by Armistead Burt, following his move from Pendleton to Abbville and his marriage to Martha Calhoun - both in 1828, the house has remained in the same family ever since. Present owner and occupant is Burt's great-great niece, Mrs. Mary Stark Davis. Burt himself was a distinguished Abbeville lawyer who served in both the United States and Confederate Congresses.

It is especially important that the house achieve National Register status at this time since Mrs. Davis plans a bequest that, at her death, the house and all its furnishings shall become the property of the Abbeville County Historic Preservation Commission. The property must be maintained as a historic house and may be used as the Commission deems best.

The Burt House is already a historic shrine, its importance increased by its location in South Carolina's importantly historic Abbeville district, and in Abbeville town, a spot of great charm that retains a number of other important historic landmarks.
