West-Harris House
Hamilton County, Indiana

BUILDING DESCRIPTION

The West-Harris House is an ell-shaped 2-story single family residence with a large attic space. It was constructed in two phases. The original portion was initially a log structure built around 1826. It included much of the main block of the building as seen today, including the four main rooms. The second phase, done around 1895, included the stair hall, 2-story kitchen ell with rear porch and the attic space. The house is constructed using the post and beam technique in the original section and a stick wood frame in the addition. Both sections are covered with horizontal siding on the exterior and plaster on the interior. It has a brick foundation and currently an asphalt shingle roof. The house is a simple design with the exception of a large Palladian window in each gable end at attic level.

The main facade, south, is two and one-half stories in height and 6 bays wide. The facade can be divided in half vertically with each side being a mirror image of the other. On the first level, the bays are defined by the pattern of a door with a six over six double hung window on each side. The second floor repeats the placement of the windows. The attic level is defined by two dormer windows, each roughly centered over the entry doors. A large unadorned central chimney mass rises above the peak of the roof. The facade is bounded at the corners by simple, classically inspired pilasters. The pilasters are articulated with a projecting wooden base and two horizontal bands representing the capital. They are fluted at the second level. The roofline is defined by an entablature formed by two pieces of wide flat trim. A one story porch was removed from this facade at some point, but it can be seen in a photograph dating from c. 1895.

The west facade can be divided into two sections: the main body of the house and the kitchen ell. The main body of the house is two bays wide. It shares the window size and type with the main facade. The striking feature of this portion of the facade is the large Palladian style window on the gable end of the roof. The use of the entablature and returned eave detailing creates a pediment out of the gable end, further emphasizing the window. While the Palladian window is centered on this portion of the facade, the windows below are offset, reflecting the different phases of construction. The kitchen ell is two bays wide and two stories in height. It is capped by a cross gable roof which is slightly lower than the main roof. The windows are typical to the house and are evenly spaced on both floors.

The north facade of the house can also be divided into two almost equal in width sections: the main house and the gable end of the kitchen ell. The main house portion has a door centered on the first floor and a window centered over it on the second floor. The gable end has three windows, one on the first floor located toward the northwest corner of the house and two on the second floor. One of the second floor windows is located directly above the first floor window. The other, slightly taller window is offset from the northeast pilaster, a similar distance to the offset of the other windows from the northwest pilaster. The detailing of both sections is typical of the rest of the house.

The east facade is similar to the west facade with a couple of exceptions. The most noticeable variation is a large bay window. The bay window mimicks the detailing found on the rest of the house with the addition of dentils defining the projecting roofline. The kitchen ell also varies the regular placement of windows on the first floor by utilizing a door and oversized window. There is evidence of a one story porch along the ell which is confirmed through historic photographs. It appears to have been a screened porch, possibly a sleeping porch.

The interior of the house can be divided into four areas: the main block of the house, the stairhall, the kitchen ell and the attic space.

The main block of the house has two rooms on each floor with a central chimney mass providing the placement of fireplaces in both first floor rooms. The first floor rooms have simple wide chairrails and baseboards which, along with the entry doors, date to the original structure. The east room was altered with the addition of the bay window and treatment around the fireplace of a built-in bookcase cabinet. The fireplace openings in both rooms have been altered with the use of modern brick to reduce the opening size. The second floor rooms are unadorned except for the baseboards and door and window surrounds. These rooms have visible chimney masses, but no remaining evidence of fireplace openings. All four of these rooms have small square bump-outs which run from floor to ceiling at the outside building corners. These are in keeping with the larger corner members typical in post and beam construction.

The stairhall runs full length along the north side of the house's main block. Both front rooms on the first floor have doors which connect to it, and there is speculation that these might have been the location of either exterior doors or windows. The stairhall acts as the main hub of the house, providing west end access to the basement under the kitchen ell and to the kitchen itself. There is also a small pantry/storage room under the stairs at this end. On the east end, there is a door leading out to the rear porch. The stairs, in keeping with the rest of the house, are simply detailed with an unadorned banister and turned ballusters. On the second floor, there are two modern bathrooms located at each end. The one at the west end is accessible from the hall while the other is only accessed from the front room. Both front rooms, as well as two small rooms over the kitchen ell, are connected to the hall.

The kitchen ell contains a large open area used for food preparation. The counter/appliance layout in this area was completely remodeled in recent years. There is evidence that a chimney ran up the north wall, but no physical sign of it exists except for a section in the attic. A built-in china cabinet with large glass doors was located in the southeast corner of the kitchen. This cabinet was removed during the move of the building and will be re-installed with the rehabilitation project. Adjacent to the kitchen and behind the basement stairs is another small room. Cabinets with above fixed windows line the wall shared with the stairs. The second floor space is divided into two small rectangular rooms oriented north/south. These rooms share the same simplicity found in the front rooms.

The attic space is accessed through a pull down ladder (c.1895) in the middle of the second floor hall. The attic covers the entire footprint of the house. Its size and height allowed for its use as storage. The original shake roof is visible through the rafters. Two brick chimneys are visible, one along the north gable and one central to the front rooms.

The outbuilding is a single story rectangular building constructed out of rubble stone. There was a cold storage basement accessed through a narrow opening in the floor. The roof is a simple gable with flared eaves and triangular dormer vents. The only openings are a door and small window on the main, south, facade, two small windows on the east facade, and a small window on the north facade. The building's most recent use was as a 2-room cottage. It is commonly referred to as both an ice house and a summer kitchen.

While the buildings are currently vacant, a complete rehabilitation project is being undertaken. Historic elements are being restored or replicated following the Secretary of the Interior's Guidelines for Rehabilitation. Historic photographs and physical evidence are providing the information for reconstruction of the exterior porches on the house. New photographs will be provided upon completion of the project.

India Crago Harris also attended Northwestern University. She studied law with her husband and aided him in his research. She was also very involved in the art and social circles of Indianapolis. She was one of the first members of the Art Association of Indianapolis in 1883, serving as both its recording secretary (1893-99) and its president (1904-07). In 1905, she laid the cornerstone for the John Herron Art Institute museum building which was constructed during her presidency.

She founded the Herron Art Institute library, donating a case of her books and serving for many years as chairman of the library committee. In 1917, a portrait of her by Cecilia Beaux was presented to the museum. Her Viennese court dresses and accessories worn during her husband's Ambassadorship in Austria-Hungary were also donated to the Herron Art Institute museum. She also actively supported the Indianapolis Orphans Asylum, later the Board of Children's Guardians Home.

Mrs. Harris made the Allisonville home her primary residence sometime after her husband's death. She died in 1948 just two months shy of her 100th birthday. In her will, she donated the Allisonville farm to Indiana University to sell and use the proceeds to fund a law lecture series in her husband's name.

Addison and India Crago Harris were both prominent, active residents of Indiana. While most of their activities were concentrated locally, for a brief time they served the United States internationally. Their involvement in politics, education, and the arts was extensive and long-lasting, leaving permanent marks on Indianapolis society. Their deaths can attest to this, making front-page news in the Indianapolis Star and News.

When the last private owner died in the fall of 1995, the farm was sold at auction to the Washington Park Cemetery Association. They divided the property into three pieces, one they retained to enlarge the neighboring cemetery, one was donated to the town of Fishers for a park, and the third was sold for commercial development. The house and stone building sat on this third piece, and plans were announced to demolish all remaining structures. At the time, this included several barns and a modern garage. The cemetery association wanted to be able to offer a "clean" site when selling the property for commercial development. With this announcement, several people in the community began a campaign to save the house.

During the spring of 1996, the town of Fishers announced it would take possession of the house and move it to the town-owned land adjacent to the park land. The stone structure and pillars were later donated as well. The house was moved in the fall of 1996 and the stone building and pillars in the spring of 1997. The Fishers Historic Preservation Committee was soon formed and since then has been working to raise funds to preserve the house. The Committee hopes to open it as a historical museum, focusing on the development of the area through the West, Hartman and Harris families.

Of secondary significance is the architecture of the house itself, both the log construction and the renovations by the HARRISES. Although not seen from the exterior, the front two rooms of the house retain their original log structure dating back to the West family. These logs can be seen from the basement level and show a type of log construction used 175 years ago and not commonly found today.

On the exterior, there have been no irreversible changes to the HARRISES' renovations. The corner pilasters, end gable pediments, bay window dentils, Palladian windows and L-plan massing are all in place. Only the one-story front porch is missing but will soon be replaced using a photograph from

c. 1895. This house is interesting for its combination of construction methods which support its listing to the National Register.

Although moved buildings are generally not eligible for listing on the National Register, we believe it should be listed as an exception for several reasons. First, this property is eligible for the National Register under criteria B, its association with Addison and India C. Harris. While the surroundings are important, the primary significance is their ownership, which is not affected by the relocation. Second, this is the only extant Harris residence since their Meridian Street home was demolished in the 1930s. No other known extant building is directly connected to them during the time period they were most prominent in the political and social circles of Indianapolis. Third, Addison was born and raised on a farm, and farming was a hobby of his. This home represents the part of his life as a gentlemen farmer. Last, this structure had to be moved to escape demolition. Every attempt to prevent its demolition and leave the home on its original site was unsuccessful.

We also believe the home remains eligible since it retains most of the seven aspects of integrity on the new site. The design, materials and workmanship were not altered by moving the house. The current setting is similar to its original setting. Although both buildings were moved about 2 miles from their original site, they remain oriented toward a planned park entry road and retain their rural setting on a wooded lot. The two buildings are also sited with the same relationship as originally constructed. The feeling and association of the property also remain unchanged. Since the house is more secluded than it has been since Allisonville became such a busy road, it is more representative of the area when the Wests, Hartmans and HARRISES lived here.
