The Camp House is situated on a sizable lot on a busy commercial and residential street in northeast Knoxville. Built as a residence in 1890, the structure, with additions to the rear, and the separate carriage house are offices of WATE Television Station.

The two and a half story house built of rough stone, is in the Richardsonian Romanesque style. Contrasting with the gray stone walls is the brown-red stone used in the lintels and string courses. The entire building is a series of contrasting shapes: arched windows on the first floor, slightly curved windows on the second, straight-topped windows on the tower; the flat pedimented north side of the front facade, the square tower with a pyramidal roof on the entrance section, and the round projecting bay with a conical roof on the south side. A triple arch frames the front entrance. The date "1890" is carved in stone on the eave of the south side of the building. A modern brick addition is to the rear and barely visible from the street. A parking lot covers the east side of the lot.

To the south of the main building and just across the driveway is a one and a half story carriage house, now offices, built of rough stone and in a style compatible with the dwelling.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Knoxville was a wealthy community at the end of the nineteenth century, as evidenced by the many fine houses built in the city at that time. Although there are several of these structures still standing, probably the finest is the Camp House.

According to the Director of the McClung Historical Collection of the Knoxville-Knox County Public Library, there was correspondence between the Knoxville stonemason who built the house and architect A. B. Mullett, who, it is believed, designed the building. The librarian also reported reading accounts contemporary with the construction of the Camp House that it was a duplicate of President Garfield's house.

The house is now serving an adaptive use as offices and studies for a television station.
