STATEMENT:

The Schmidt blocks is an excellent illustration of the adaptation of Richardsonian Romanesque to a commercial structure. The use of rockfaced sandstone, particularly at the heavy window arches is a typical feature. The building also displays a handsome metal cornice (although the swag-embellished frieze is more Adamesque than Romanesque) and an unusual blind "loggia" featuring very short engaged columns. Although a few other buildings in the central city have adapted Richardsonian features to brick construction, the Schmidt Block is the only commercial building recorded in the survey to use the style in stone.
