Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Ustick School is a two-story institutional building with an exterior of cream-colored brick laid in common bond. Its cedar-shingled roof has gabled and hipped sections with a pyramidal bell tower, flag pole, and attic dormer vent. The Colonial Revival style main entrance has a porch with denticulated eaves supported by classically massed Ionic columns. A round arch frames an inset front door. Windows are seven-foot double-hung sash. On the interior, paneled and molded woodwork exhibits craftsman style influence.

The four-room school was constructed between 1909 and 1911. Sometime after 1911 a gabled gymnasium was added onto the west facade. The addition was dismantled sometime between 1967 and 1982.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Ustick School is historically significant as a remnant of the rural commercial center of Ustick; the building is architecturally significant as a local example of a Colonial Revival period school building. The community of Ustick dates from 1908, when the interurban streetcar company built a line through the area, connecting it with Boise and surrounding towns. Ustick comprised a number of irrigated orchards around a small center of about three blocks, not all of them fully developed. Besides the school building, Ustick had an interurban depot, two churches, a bank, and a few retail stores and residences. The bank building, the interurban depot, two store buildings, and a few residences survive, although they are too scattered to comprise a district nomination. Suburban development west from Boise has already begun to engulf the area, which was originally about five miles out of Boise. The school building is one of the few institutional and commercial buildings surviving to represent the early development of Ustick. The Idaho State Historic Sites Inventory records sixteen school buildings surviving in Boise and the surrounding countryside that may be eligible for National Register listing. Among these, the Ustick school is a good example of the four-room plan with Colonial Revival massing and details. The other Colonial Revival style schools have experienced changes in massing through 1920s additions.
