Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

This small building is the only remaining structure of what was once a military complex "The Fuerte de la Concepción". The old Fort was protected by a moat and walls. It had a guard and sentry house, a large two-story building, a smaller one-story structure and cannon platforms facing the port entrance. All these were severely damaged during the 1918 earthquake and were later razed together with the walls. Only the small one-story structure was left since its strong thick mortar and brick walls were able to withstand the earthquake; only the ceiling collapsed and was later rebuilt in metal instead of the original brick. During this remodeling a concrete floor was placed over the original one.

The simple rectangular structure contains molded window frames and door openings, cornice, and a high rectangular frontispiece. The East elevation sports three molded windows. The West facade has one door and a window plus a stepped parapet. The North elevation contains three small molded windows and one door. The remaining facade provides four doors (no cornice or parapet was provided on this side). Two of the buildings corners are slightly curved, motif that is repeated by the cornice above. Inside, the existing roof is of later construction, but the massive walls and plan disposition are original.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Being strategically located on the northwestern corner of the Island, Aguadilla was a favorite target for British war vessels as a result of the long-standing hostilities between Spain and Great Britain.

This strategic area was protected by a small battery erected during the second half of the XVIII Century. Its military value was confirmed first in 1797 and 1801 during British attacks to the area and again in 1819 and 1825 during the Spanish Main rebel attacks. The confirmation of the area's military importance made the Spanish government expand the fortification. In 1880 the "Fuerte de la Concepción" military complex was built.

Most of the Island's defense system was centered around the capital, and very few fortifications were built along the coasts. The remaining building of the Fuerte de la Concepción Military Complex was one of them. This small structure is a good example of secondary fortification Spanish military architecture in Puerto Rico.
