Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The potato house of the Dickerson complex is a fine example of the building type and is one of the few surviving full two story examples in Little Creek and Broad Creek Hundreds. It is located west of Laurel, Delaware at the intersection of Roads 494 and 498 having buildings on northwest, northeast, and southeast corners of the intersection. The potato house rests on the southeast corner. It measures 30 feet 4 inches by 23 feet 3 inches. The surrounding environment consists of numerous outbuildings including corn cribs, a wash house, barn, cart shed, school house and barn. The potato house stands alone on its corner of the intersection separated from the rest of the complex by Road 494. Cultivated and uncultivated fields surround the complex. The land is very flat and the present day crops are Indian corn and soy bean.

The Dickerson Potato House was built in the early 1900s. It is a balloon frame, gable fronted structure and retains its original narrow width, milled siding and interior brick chimney. The whole rests upon a brick foundation.

Fenestration of the front gable end is altered slightly (two windows and double sliding door added) but remains original on the lateral sides and rear gable end. On the front and rear gable ends, original fenestration included centrally placed first, second, and third (attic) story loading doors, and centrally placed first and second story windows on lateral sides of the building. Rear gable end and lateral side fenestration remains in its original arrangement. Tightly fitting hatches cover all windows and doors.

The interior condition is unknown though storage bins have been removed for equipment storage.

The roof is of modern asphalt shingles over original wood shingles.

The Dickerson Potato House is eligible for nomination to the National Register of Historic Places as an excellent example of an architectural reflection of a broad historical trend and as a significant architectural type. The potato house as a functional type relates to the Delaware Comprehensive Historic Preservation Plan's Study unit III under the 1880-1940 period and is an example of that plan's property type 1B reflecting major economic and cultural trends relating to agriculture.

The broad historical pattern to which the potato house is directly linked is the modernization of agricultural practices in southern Delaware during the first half of the twentieth century including the emergence of truck farming, the growth of perishable produce crops, and the development of modern agricultural marketing. The growth of sweet potato cultivation in southern Delaware was one of the major manifestations of these changes in production practices and crop choice. The potato house is the remaining physical evidence of this important trend in Sussex County's agricultural history when the sweet potato was "king".

Sweet potato cultivation dominated the region particularly in the years between 1910-1940, and was one of the first crops to benefit from truck farming and modern agricultural marketing. The long (eight month) and multi-phased process of sweet potato production impacted the culture and economy of the rural community in Sussex County during the years of its prominence as one of the area's cash crops.

The potato house is significant as an architectural type. It was essential \boxed{x} See continuation sheet to the process of sweet potato production in both curing and storage capacities and was developed as a distinct building type to provide the functional needs required for a successful, saleable sweet potato crop. Potato houses share common construction elements and are recognizable on the landscape as belonging to this specific property type. The Dickerson Potato House is an excellent example of the property type retaining elements characteristic of potato house construction and function. These elements include; multiple sheathing, gable end orientation, interior chimney, and closely fitting window hatches.

The significance of the Dickerson Potato House lies also in its excellent condition and unusual size. It retains the exterior integrity while its full two story size indicates that the sweet potato crop and subsequent storage was a primary concern for the Dickerson agricultural complex.

The Dicerson Potato House has integrity of location , design, materials, workmanship, and association.
