DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Breck's Mill area is three miles northwest of Wilmington on the Brandywine and has three different types of buildings that exemplify the industrial community of early 19th Century: The Mill; The Workers' houses; The Mill Owner's Home.

From the outside Breck's Mill has been little changed since it was rebuilt in 1813. Badly damaged by fire in 1846, it was rebuilt as before within six weeks. It is a large sturdy construction, 55 feet by 43 feet, three stories high of random stone with five bays. Brick flat arches are over the windows. The stone bell tower has its fifth story of brick with louvered sides. Early photos show the top of the bell tower as flat. It now has a pitched roof as does the main building of the Mill.

Close to the mill is an area of small domestic buildings that originally housed the workers for the nearby mills and trades people to service their needs. These were small single or double houses unlike the long row houses, the "Banks," on the other side of the river. Rectangle in shape, built of stone or clapboard with shed roof and dormers, they had simple wooden porches centered in front of the house with wooden stairs, square balusters and square columns. The Charles I. duPont house on the north end of the Creek Road is this type house although a bit more substantial and generous in its proportions. It is of random field stone. In the case of Hagee's Tavern, the porch was two story. Inside, the floor plan was a simple division of two or three rooms downstairs and upstairs. There is a chimney on each end of the house. Fifteen buildings remain from the mill working times, not including Breck's Mill or the mill owner's house, "Rokeby." These original structures, most of which are greatly modified for contemporary living, are indicated by shading in the accompanying map. Only one is not in its original site: The Kennett Pike Toll House has been moved from the northwest corner of Breck's Lane and Kennett Pike and is now incorporated as part of No. 198, Breck's Lane.

"Rokeby" was built in 1836 for Gabrielle du Pont when she married William Breck, then part owner of the mill that still carries his This late Federal house is rectangular in plan, measuring name. 55 feet across and 26 feet 4 inches deep. It is entered through a small portico with two Ionic columns on plinths. The entrance side is two story. Opposite the long rectangular entrance hall are two identical marble mantels with marble shelves. Two bays open on to a porch with a two story portico overlooking the Brandywine. This portico measures 9 feet by 34 feet 9 inches. A family story says that Gabrielle wished to imitate Louviers and sent architects to measure the house (said to be upper, but portico indicates lower). They measured the inside and applied those measurements to the outside of the new house. Hence, everything was more condensed in the new structure and little room was left for the stairway. Although extended by Alice du Pont Wilson when she moved into it in 1911, it still has a cramped aspect.

LTER CRIVETI RO 1971

The Breck's Mill area is an excellent example of an early 19th Century industrial village. Around 1813 large mills were being built on the Brandywine due to advanced technical skills that could dam the river and due, too, to the larger demands of the American markets cut off from Europe by the 1812 War. Louis McLane and his brother-in-law, George Milligan, bought the mill site from Vincent Gilpin in 1813 and built the large stone mill that is now known as Breck's Mill. As in other industrial area the 19th Century factory was to grow where earlier 18th Century mills had been. Gilpin had had a saw mill and a grist mill near to where the large stone mill was built. McLane used all these mills for cotton production. Louis McLane was to become Senator, United States Minister to England, Secretary of the Treasurer, and Secretary of State. Various subsequent tenants ran the mill. In 1832, William Breck became one of the partners to take over the mill, marrying in 1836, the niece of Charles I. du Pont and becoming his manager when Charles I. du Pont who had been involved since his youth in the woolen industry at the Louviers Mills further up the stream, brought woolen production to Breck's Mill and the production of blankets. Fire and debts led to loans from the du Pont Company which took over the property in 1852. However, the mill ceased to function in 1854 prior to the more widespread depression of 1857-1858. It has been a recreational center off and on since 1890 and now belongs to the Hagley Museum. The nearby earlier grist mill, transformed and made part of the McLane textile industry, was called Rokeby, after a poem of Sir Walter Scott. It was used by the du Pont Company as its first experimental station. It burned in 1906 and was not replaced.

A characteristic of the early 19th Century industrial scene was the compactness of the community. Close to the mill and the source of its power, the river, were the workers' houses and not far from them the millowner's house. Although these houses have been modified and there are fewer of them, the feeling of the closely grouped homes on the hillside can be found in the Breck's Mill area. Breck's Lane runs into Creek Road, on the west bank of the river. At the north end of this road is the house built by Charles I. du Pont, the only house in this area that is in the Historic American Buildings Survey. On the south end of Creek Road is Hagee's Tayern, the only building left with a commercial function. Breck's Mill area was

Breck's Mill Area--Description--2

On the garden facade, or river side, two Ionic columns support a pediment with center window. The house is three stories on this side, with bays extending two stories in height. The plan of the house remains basically the same with kitchen in the basement. Another living wing has been recently extended on the North end. Many original details remain such as the attractive single leaderhead with star design and downspout in the South end of the house; also a fine floral motif of plaster cornice running through both front parlors. Close to the South of the house is the handsome rubble stone barn, measuring 60 feet by 40 feet and mentioned in early documents.
