Description:

(8-86)

The Collison House is a 2½-story mansard-roofed dwelling located on the southwest corner of North Walnut and Justis streets, facing east. The house occupies an unusually large lot for its neighborhood, and is set back from the sidewalk, behind a hedge; a lawn studded with trees and ornamental plantings extends to the west and south of the house.

The building is essentially square both in plan and massing. It stands three bays wide by three bays deep, two stories high below a steep mansard roof with gabled dormers. It is of frame construction, sheathed in wooden German siding with a 5¼" exposure and a 4" drop. The siding terminates at narrow corner boards, and a beveled skirt board marks the base. The building rests on a parged brick foundation.

The principal (east) facade is symmetrical, with a transomed central entrance flanked on either side by narrow two-over-two windows. A small pedimented portico shelters the entrance, supported on chamfered posts with Eastlake-style braces and scrolled brackets. This portico was altered from a former porch which spanned the facade; both architectural and photographic evidence survive to document the original configuration of the porch. Windows here, as throughout the exterior, are framed with plain board trim; non-functional louvered shutters have been attached beside the ground-floor openings. On the second story, three two-overtwo windows are ranged across the facade, below a bracketed cornice with molded fascia and crowh molding. The mansard is sheathed in asphalt shingles, and features gabled dormers with two-over-two sash and elaborate Eastlake-derived detailing, including overhanging eaves, applied stickwork and jigsawn decoration.

The north elevation, facing Justis Street, is fenestrated similarly. The outer bays hold two-over-two windows on the first and second story levels, and gabled dormers in the mansard. The central bay is irregular; on the ground floor, it holds a two-over-two window shifted to the west (right) of center, with a secondary entrance to its right. This doorway features a transom and a small hood supported on Eastlake-style braces. On the second story, the central bay is blank, with a small pediment interrupting the cornice and a pair of engaged posts presumably indicating the location of a former balcony or sleeping porch. A brick interior chimney rises above the mansard between the east and central bays.

The south elevation is composed of two parts, with a two story, three-sided projecting bay with narrow one-over-one windows defining the eastern section, and paired two-over-two sash centered in the western section on both levels. The mansard is lighted by two broad gabled dormers holding paired one-over-one sash; decorative detailing of the dormers is consistent with those elsewhere.

The west (rear) elevation is three irregular bays wide. A one-story hiproofed porch across the center and south bays has been enclosed, but retains its original bracket trim. An exterior flue has been constructed against the wall immediately to the south (right) of the north bay. Remaining fenestration is consistent in type and detailing with that elsewhere in the house.

The interior was not available for investigation. According to information supplied by the realtor who listed the property for sale at the time this nomination was prepared, it features a center-passage plan with a back stair, hardwood floors, and a (closed) fireplace in the parlor. Statement of Significance:

The Collison House is significant for its architecture, as the best-preserved example of Victorian period residential architecture in Newport. It combines Second Empire form and massing with decorative detailing derived from the Eastlake style, in an eclectic amalgamation typical of the period. It retains an exceptionally high degree of integrity, with the vast majority of its characterdefining features preserved intact, including the exterior German siding, projecting bay, bracketed and molded cornice, and mansard roof with Eastlakederived decorative detailing at the dormers. The only significant change to the exterior is the alteration of an original broad porch across the east facade to a one-bay pedimented portico; however, architectural evidence (in the form of "ghosting" on the siding) and photographs in a local collection clearly document the original configuration of the porch, and would permit accurate restoration of this element at some future time.

Architectural and cartographic evidence suggest a construction date in the mid-1880s. The 1868 Beers map of Newport shows North Walnut Street with dotted lines, indicating that the street was planned at that time but had not yet been opened. By 1881, the Hopkins map shows North Walnut and Justis streets in place, but the parcel at the southwest corner is indicated as vacant. The house appears on the 1893 Baist map; this map also indicates that the building was among the larger houses in Newport at the time of its construction.

The Collison House is named for the family which occupied the property continuously since 1918.
