The New London Public Library is located diagonally across from New London's gambrel roofed State Courthouse on the corner of Huntington and State Streets. It is a heavy compact structure which is cramped on a treeless corner immediately next to the sidewalk at a very busy intersection. The building plan consists of two sections which intersect at right angles. The gabled section which faces on Huntington Street contains the main area of the library. To the right of the three Syrian arches which form the entrance on Huntington Street is a round turret with polygonal roof, the top of which is not higher than the facade gable, and which is consequently subordinated to it in the totality of the building design.

The materials of the building consist of Milford granite with contrasting brownstone trim in the manner typical of Richardson. The rough-faced granite is laid in regular courses; while the brownstone creates a darker contrast in the window frames and mullions, the Syrian arches of the entry and the windows of the second floor, the steps of the entrance and the band courses which circumscribe the building below the windows and at the cornice which continues up the rake of the roof. The Akron tile roof has an eyelid dormer on the Huntington Avenue side and there are higher more conventionally-roofed dormers in the rear.

Shortly after its construction in 1889 the building was described in Harper's Weekly in the following manner:

The site is a pleasant slope practically in the centre of the city, at the junction of two broad elm-bowered streets, Huntington and State, the latter being the chief business thoroughfare, but bordered at this point—at its head, and near the quaint eight—teenth—century Court—house—with handsome dwellings and gardens. The sloping ground gives opportunity for a large and convenient basement. dry, and well—lighted. From the front the building (40 x 90 feet) presents somewhat the appearance of one tall story with a high sloping roof, although in reality there are two stories, as may be seen by the gable, pierced with three arched windows, over which appears a carved stone tympanum bearing the arms of New London—a ship under full sail.

The interior arrangements are excellent. The Delivery Room, entered from the porch/which has three groined vaults/ is nearly in the middle of the building, with a Magazine Room at the rear, and on the left a Reading-Room lighted from three sides. It contains an elaborately carved stone fireplace, and will be paneled, both between the heavy beams of the ceiling and around the walls, to a height of thirteen feet, with quartered oak well rubbed, which forms the finish of all the lower rooms. To the right of the Delivery-Room are the Librarian's Office and the spacious Book-Room. The latter has an immediate capacity of 30,000 volumes, on the "stack" plan, bring every book within easy reach of the arm, and the height of the stacks can be increased so as to accommodate 50,000. Every aisle between the stacks is flooded with light from the two sides of the room. The whole second story of the building is occupied by one large room, finished in fine Georgia pine which will be the home of the New London County Historical Society.

The building has not been altered since the time of its construction with the one possible exception of an elevator which although it appears to date from the nineteenth century does not appear in the plans.

George Parsons Lathrop, "The Public Library at New London,"

Harpers Weekly, July 27, 1889.
