The Paradise Park Historic District consists of Paradise Park and historic residential properties that border it. Paradise Park is a triangular-shaped park located southeast of the Thomasville central business district, and just south of the Atlantic Coast Line railroad tracks.

The district is situated on high, level land with sandy soil. The park is landscaped with a thick stand of pine trees, oaks with Spanish moss, palm trees, and magnolias. It is decorated with park furniture, playground equipment, and a gazebo with bell-shaped roof. The streets are laid out in a radiating pattern, curving to the east and west around the triangular-shaped park. The lots are large and are situated in such a way to allow the houses to have a pattern in their placement around the park. Most of the streets in the district have sidewalks and are informally landscaped with oak, dogwood, crepe myrtle, cherry laurels, tall pine, shrubbery, and palm trees. South Broad Street is lined on both sides with large oaks draped with Spanish moss. The non-historic property located at 701 South Broad is bordered by an old wrought-iron fence. The Keefer House, a large Victorian Eclectic residence located at 817 East Hansell Street is bordered by a white picket fence.

Historic houses within the district include large wood-framed structures in the Victorian Eclectic, Neoclassical, Colonial Revival, and Craftsman/Bungalow styles. Several fine two-story Neoclassical and Victorian Eclectic style houses are located on South Broad Street and East Hansell Street. Neoclassical details include front porches with Ionic columns, central triangular pediments, denticulated cornices, balustrades, and Palladian windows. Most residences along East Loomis and Park Avenue are single-story structures with central porticos on front porches with tapered columns, screened-in side porches and dormer gable windows. One property along East Hansell Street includes a historic carriage house to the rear.

The boundaries of the district include the park and East Hansell Street and Colton Avenue to the east, a small portion of East Loomis Street to the east, the rear of properties along East Hansell Street, the south of South Broad Street, and a portion of both sides of West Hansell Street and the intersection of South Broad Street. The district boundary has been drawn to circumscribe Paradise Park and the historic residential development directly associated with it. The Paradise Park Historic District is bordered by railroad tracks to the north, non-historic development to the west, and historic residential development with a different character and appearance to the southeast.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Paradise Park Historic District is significant in the areas of architecture, community planning and development, landscape architecture, and local history. In terms of architecture, the district is significant for its collection of impressive late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century houses which reflect Victorian Eclectic, Neoclassical, Colonial Revival, and Craftsman/Bungalow styling. In the area of community planning and development, the district is significant for illustrating how a turn-of-the-century suburban community developed on the land of a late-nineteenth-century estate. In terms of landscape architecture, the district is significant for Paradise Park, Thomasville's largest historic park. In the area of local history, the district is significant for containing the historic homes of some of Thomasville's important winter residents, many of whom held local business interests. Paradise Park Historic District meets National Register criteria A, B, and C.

Architecturally, the Paradise Park Historic District is important for its fine turn-of-the-century residential structures, all of which are wood-framed and designed in the Victorian Eclectic, Neoclassical, Colonial Revival, and Craftsman/Bungalow styles. Most of the large two-story structures located on South Broad Street and East Hansell Street have front porches or central porticoes with Classical or Victorian detailing. These houses are good examples of residential architecture at the turn of the century in south Georgia and throughout the state. Some of the outstanding examples of Victorian Eclectic and Neoclassical styles include the Keefer House, 817 East Hansell; the Hebard House, 711 East Hansell; and the Strawbridge House, 704 South Broad. Other architecturally significant structures are 701 East Hansell, 110 East Hansell, and 900 South Broad.

In terms of community planning and development, Paradise Park is important as a planned suburban community that was developed in the late-nineteenth century as a result of the division of the estate of S. Alexander Smith. In the early 1890s, prominent winter residents bought large lots on Hansell and Broad streets, most of which faced the park. The park and street pattern are all a part of the radiating street pattern which contrasts with Thomasville's original grid-iron pattern. Builders and contractors associated with the development of the district include James Gribben (who built the Strawbridge House in 1899) and William Miller (who built the Hebard House in 1899-1900).

In the area of landscape architecture, the district is important for Paradise Park, Thomasville's largest historic park, that was deeded to the city in 1889. It is characteristic of south Georgia landscaping with its level terrain and numerous tall pine trees. The residential district is also significant for its informally landscaped front yards and street trees, which include large oaks with Spanish moss, dogwoods, cherry laurels, crepe myrtles, and small palm trees.

In terms of local history, Paradise Park is significant for containing the historic homes of some of Thomasville's important winter residents, many of whom also held local business interests. Some of the district's earliest residents include George Forbes, owner of Forbes Furniture and Hardware; W.S. Keefer, president of the Thomasville Cigar Company and founder of the Thomasville Ice Plant; Charles Hebard, a Philadelphia lumber magnate, and Judge Strawbridge, a distributor of quality clothing. Because of these associations, the Paradise Park area was known locally as "Yankee Paradise" at the turn of the century. This was the period in Thomasville's history when the hotel era began to decline and Northern visitors leased or built winter homes and cottages on the subdivided land from the S. Alexander Smith estate.
