Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Odd Fellows Cemetery is a three acre tract located on a hill overlooking U.S. Highway 82 at Henderson Street, northwest of the central business district, in Starkville, Mississippi. Local tradition maintains that this hill was the site of a Chocchuma Indian settlement, but no evidence of Indian occupation now remains at the site (information provided by Professor Richard Marshall, Cobb Institute of Archaeology, Mississippi State University). The unfenced, grassy lawn is shaded by a scattering of fairly large trees. There are numerous gravestones, most of which are modest in size and ornamentation. Most are simple headstones. The earlier stones generally are vertical slabs of marble. More recent stones tend to be granite tablets of conventional type. Many of the family plots are surrounded by masonry copings. The earliest gravestone discovered dates to 1913. The cemetery has been used continuously from about 1911 to the present as a place of interment. The earliest graves were scattered about through the cemetery, but with the passage of time, many of these graves developed into clusters of graves as relatives were buried around these first interments. Today, burials are more-or-less evenly distributed about the cemetery. Throughout the cemetery, the graves are oriented in an east-west direction, normally facing eastward.

Since 1976, the cemetery has been the object of a continuing beautification and restoration effort which has resulted in the orderly appearance of the cemetery today. There is little evidence of any formal landscaping. A Mississippi State historical marker was erected at Odd Fellows Cemetery in 1979. Today the cemetery has the fairly typical appearance of most cemeteries that continue in use -- its appearance is a blend of the past and the present through its mixture of old and new gravestones.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Odd Fellows Cemetery is significant as the most intact historic property associated with the growth and development of the black community of Starkville, seat of Oktibbeha County, Mississippi. The black community has historically constituted a significant proportion of the population of Starkville since its beginnings in the 1830s. The cemetery represents the longstanding historical presence of the black community by effectively documenting in its gravestones the existence of generations of people for whom otherwise there might be no surviving material memorial. In addition the family plots, frequently set apart by a low masonry coping, serve to illustrate social customs in the practice of burying relatives together in clusters.

Because the black community has historically been far less economically advantaged than Starkville's white community, there are no other identified historic resources associated with the black community that could be considered eligible for the National Register. In recent decades, as the black community has grown economically, older church buildings and other structures that have served as the traditional focal points of black society have been replaced by modern construction. The homes, institutions and places of business associated with the historically influential members of the black community have either not survived (due to urban renewal) or have suffered major losses of physical integrity. An example is the barber shop of Robert Wier, the first black-owned business in Starkville, which was demolished several years ago. Most of the older housing is of sub-standard construction and will eventually have to be replaced. The efforts, both private and city-sponsored, undertaken since 1976 to restore the cemetery are indicative of the significance with which it is regarded by the community. The paucity of black cultural resources thus increases the relative significance of the Odd Fellows Cemetery (cf. NR Bulletin 15, p. 56, item 4).

The cemetery appears to have been established about 1911 in which year the parcel of land that it occupied was purchased by Lodge No. 2948 of the Grand United Order of Odd Fellows of America, a white organization which donated the land for use as a black burial ground. It soon became the main cemetery for the black community of Starkville. Over the decades the Odd Fellows Cemetery has become the last resting place for the most prominent leaders of Starkville's black community including the educator E. W. Hazen and businessmen N. F. Daily, Charles Alexander, and Robert Wier. The life of Robert Wier was memorialized in a biography that was written by his wife, Sadye H. Wier, and published by the University Press of Mississippi. Because the Odd Fellows Cemetery has been continuously used since it was founded in 1911 without any significant temporal changes in burial practices, its period of significance, which in practice extends to the present, is for National Register purposes arbitrarily closed at 1940, this date being fifty years previous to the date of this nomination.
