VII. Description

The First United Presbyterian Church is located at 321 North Jackson Street in Athens (pop. 13,334), McMinn County, Tennessee. The church is located at the intersection of Jackson Street and Roy Street on a downward sloping parcel of land and faces east toward the campus of Tennessee Wesleyan University. It is rectangular in plan with a gable roof that is flanked by square towers on both sides. Constructed in 1892, the late Gothic Revival brick building rests on a stone foundation. The gabled roof is covered with asphalt shingles and the two square tower steeples are capped with decorative tin sheets. The exterior walls are sectioned by two tiered engaged buttresses and the American bond brickwork has a header course for each seven courses of stretchers. All of the pointed arch windows feature original, multi-colored stained glass windows with wood tracery and are outlined by brick voussoirs. The church has had very few alterations and has a high level of integrity.

The east facade faces North Jackson Street and features a turn-of-the century stone wall at the front of the building's property. There are corner towers of equal height on each end of the façade. They feature decorative brickwork with two rows of recessed brick headers and a row of vertical stretchers in the center on all four sides. Brick corbelling is present underneath the belfry openings. Each tower shelters matching square narthex reception areas. Short walks from the sidewalk lead to both church entrances where they feature pointed arch entryways that include three sectioned stained glass windows with wood tracery over original, nine-paneled wood doors.

East Façade (N. Jackson St)

The southeast tower's belfry is covered by a rounded, decorative tin roof that is supported by four brick pillars. Decorative metal caps are on the top of the brick pillars and at the apex of the roof. Opposite, the northeast tower houses the bell and is covered by an octagonal-shaped steeple, which is covered by decorative tin sheets. An iron wind gauge rests on the tower's pinnacle. Original wood arch supports and original wood railings are present on all sides underneath both of the tower roofs. In addition, both towers include pointed arch, stained glass, double-hung sash windows with wood tracery at their bases.

Centered in the east facade between the corner towers is a large three section stained glass window allowing light into the interior nave. This wood framed window has wood tracery forming three diamond shaped panes in its pointed arch. Above and on either side of the window is decorative brickwork with two rows of recessed brick headers and a row of vertical stretchers. Centered below the gable roof eave is a decorative pointed arch panel filled with seashells. Brick corbelling is located directly underneath the panel.

The south elevation features four, stained glass, double-hung sash windows with wood tracery on the main floor level; three, one-over-one double-hung sash windows with wood lintels on the basement level; and four, two-tiered brick engaged buttresses. The buttresses act as wall supports and are a decorative element of Gothic Revival influenced structures. In addition, a four-paneled wood door with a wood lintel is located at the rear of the south elevation on the basement level.

The north elevation, facing Roy Street, features four, stained glass, double-hung sash windows with wood tracery on the main floor level; four, one-over-one double-hung sash windows with wood lintels on the basement level; and four, two-tiered brick buttresses. An original, four-paneled wood door with a three-light transom and wood lintel is located between the third and fourth window on the basement level.

The west (rear) elevation faces Church Street and features a round multi-colored stained glass window with wood tracery. The window is centered directly underneath the gabled eave.

Opera Style Seats

The interior floor plan is rectangular and its dimensions are 40'x 60'. Its primary interior features include original opera-style seats, wood wainscoting, a lofty three-sectioned stained glass window in the nave, and multi-colored stained glass windows on the north and south walls of the sanctuary. The present light fixtures were installed when the church was renovated in the 1950s.

The two separate entrances of the church open into the narrow rectangular nave. Both entrances into the nave include original, wood paneled doors. The southeast entrance, no longer in use, was recently converted into a stairwell to the community room in the basement. Located on the nave's east wall, is an original, three-sectioned stained glass window with wood tracery. The nave opens into the sanctuary where 150 opera-style seats are situated in 3 sections of 50 each. Two carpeted aisles, covering the original wood floor, run on both sides of the center section of seats. Multi-colored stained glass windows are located on the north and south walls in the sanctuary. The pulpit and original choir box are located at the west end of the sanctuary. The choir box has sixteen seats and a wood railing with turned wood balusters. Centered on the upper end of the west wall is a round multi-colored stained glass window with wood tracery.

Interior finishing details are consistently fine and represent the best of elaborate millwork produced in the local mills. All around the base of the sanctuary walls is a three-and-one-half foot wood wainscot of vertical beaded strips with a wide molded chair rail above and resting on a broad wood base. The walls above the wainscot are all smooth painted plaster. The original ceiling construction features stained wood with rounded and beaded ribs, with a pattern of triangles and rectangles in the center section of the ceiling. Very few alterations have occurred to the structure since its construction in 1892 and there have been no additions to the edifice, as it has retained a majority of its original physical characteristics.

The church's community room is located in the basement, which was renovated in the 1950s and again in 2006. Work in the basement included the addition of restrooms, a kitchen, and three gas furnaces to heat both floors. The community room has a stage located along the east wall with a converted office located to the south and a storage closet to the north. The center of the room features a 20x20 section of open space for church and community events. The kitchen is located in the southwest corner and the restrooms are located in the northwest corner of the room. The south wall in the basement features three, one-over-one double-hung sash windows and a fourpanel wood door. Opposite, the north wall includes four, one-over-one double-hung windows with a four-panel door with a three-light transom.

VIII. Statement of Significance

The First United Presbyterian Church, built circa 1892, is eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion A for its locally significant associations with African American ethnic heritage and social history. It is also eligible for the National Register under Criterion C because it represents the late Gothic Revival Style that was prevalent among religious institutions in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The nominated property served as a community center for African Americans in McMinn County and also served as a temporary school for African American children from 1925-1926.

After the Civil War, former slaves throughout the South were searching for a new identity and looked for a place that would offer them some form of training and education so they could develop the necessary skills to be successful and attain status. Many blacks began to create their own institutions where they could learn and care for each other. The primary community center for African Americans was the church. In Athens, a group of free African Americans in the antebellum era, created a community called the "Free Hill" Society. In 1865, led by Reverend William Heyward Ferguson, African Americans worshipped at St. Mark's Presbyterian Church, located near the intersection of North Jackson Street and Highway 30 in Athens. Shortly after the Civil War, in 1866, the Beth Salem Community, a group of newly emancipated slaves located southeast of Athens, began their congregation and church known as the Beth Salem Presbyterian Church (NR 6/22/2000).

The First United Presbyterian Church of Athens, Tennessee, organized their congregation in 1889 in a dance hall building, located on the corner of North White Street and Roy Street where the present church building sits today. In 1890, Reverend Jacob Lincoln Cook, a native of Athens, began the United Presbyterian mission in the dance hall building. Mr. J.L. Cook was born in Athens in 1870 and was the son of former slaves, George and Amelia Cook. He received his bachelor's degree from Knoxville College (NR 3/12/1998) in 1888 and entered the Allegheny Theological Seminary in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania to prepare for the Presbyterian ministry. After becoming an ordained minister and beginning his mission, the African American community was in need of a larger building for worship.²

The late Gothic Revival First Presbyterian Church building was constructed by some of its charter members and early founders in 1892 for the congregation and Rev. Cook's mission. The 40' x 60' brick building, erected by Rodger Sherman, Dave Logan, George McKeldin, and George Henderson, represents the late 19th and early 20th century African American craftsmanship, which followed the tradition of their enslaved ancestors' building techniques. The brick masonry on the exterior of the building and the stone wall masonry along the front entrance of the church are excellent examples of this building tradition.³

The First United Presbyterian Church, through the Freedman's Board, assisted with the establishment of the Athens Mission for the Colored People. The board contributed $2,000-$2,500 annually to the mission, which was among 80 missions in the South. During a time when blacks had limited opportunities, these missions, typically in churches, provided a safe haven for African Americans who needed shelter, strength, and a Christian brotherhood and sisterhood network.⁴

Soon after the establishment of the mission and the construction of the new church building, Reverend Jacob Cook, along with fellow mission workers Henrietta Mason, Mary Byars, Fannie Jackson, James Cleage, and Professor Pitts, organized the Athens Academy, which was a three-room building located on Depot Hill across the street from the church. The Athens Academy provided great learning opportunities for black students in the Athens area and East Tennessee region. The school was established from funds of the United Presbyterian Church and the Freedman's Board. The academy, "places an education within the reach of young people of limited means." Due to the great success of the school, a new school building, twice the size of the first building, was constructed on the corner of North Jackson Street and Green Street. The Athens Academy became recognized as one of best schools for African Americans in the South.⁵

Reverend J.L. Cook continued to serve as pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church and principal of the Athens Academy until 1900, when he moved to the Henderson Institute in Henderson, North Carolina. He died two years later, but left an impact over the church, mission, and the academy. In fact, young men involved in the academy, like the Cleage brothers, went on to establish United Presbyterian Churches in Detroit and Indianapolis.⁶

After Cook left in 1900, the church saw four more pastors take over during the first quarter of the twentieth century. Rev. John Arter, Rev. D.F. White, Rev. John Brice, and Rev. C.H. Wilson all served as pastors of the First United Presbyterian Church and principals of the Athens Academy. For a short time, from 1925-1926, the First United Presbyterian Church was used as a school when the Athens Academy was destroyed by a fire. A new school opened in December of 1926 with funds from McMinn County, the City of Athens, and the Julius Rosenwald fund, which provided funds for African American schools in the rural South. The Athens Training School, as it was known, had nine grades, 150 students, and included six classrooms, and an auditorium. Professor W. E. Nash, a teacher at Athens Academy and member of First United Presbyterian Church, became the school's first principal and served until 1953 when Professor E. Harper

Johnson succeeded him. The school's name was eventually changed to the "J.L. Cook School" to honor the spirit and work of the late reverend. It closed in the mid-1960s during the desegregation of southern schools.⁸

Reverend C.H. Wilson, who took over as pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church in 1911, served in his position for nearly 50 years. In addition, Mr. Wilson served as the principal of the Athens Academy from 1911-1926. His longstanding service to the church, mission, school, and the African American community in Athens was a testament to the early works of Rev. J.L. Cook and the importance of the church as a community center. During his tenure (1911-1958) church membership increased, which led to renovations in the church's basement.

The church merged with the Southern Presbyterian Church in 1983 and was served by student pastors from the Johnson C. Smith Seminary in Charlotte, North Carolina. In the late 1980s, the church merged with the East Tennessee Presbytery and continues to worship with a congregation of approximately thirty people. ¹⁰ The First United Presbyterian Church serves as one of the few remaining late Gothic Revival church buildings in McMinn County. The church, for over one hundred years, has been of great service to the community and it continues to represent African American culture and religion in Athens and McMinn County.
