DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The First Bank of Joseph is a fine example of High Victorian Italianate Commercial architecture. Although the style was common in Portland and the Willamette Valley, in the isolated town of Joseph in the northeast corner of the state, such a fine example of the style is quite unusual. Dimensions of the two-story building are 25 X 91 feet.

On the exterior, the vocabulary employs the basic components of High Victorian Italianate architecture as described in Marcus Whiffen. First floor windows are stilted, flat-headed arches; windows on the second floor are rectangular arches with architectural moldings. Other detailing on the exterior includes metal brackets on the upper cornice and metal moldings on the belt-course around the building. The entrance is a truncated opening at the corner of the south and west walls that is flanked with two cast-iron crocketed columns supporting a portico.

In the original configuration of the building, the first floor was occupied by the bank in the front, and a newspaper office occupied the back room. A covered exterior stairway led to an upstairs room that was used as a meeting room.

The bank moved from the building in 1914, at which time the building was taken over by Dr. Verdo Gregory. He installed his office and waiting room in the banking headquarters and a kitchen in the former newspaper room. He converted the second floor into hospital wards and an operating room and replaced the exterior stairway with one inside.

In 1927, the City of Joseph acquired the building and it became a community center. The upstairs became a meeting room and performing arts theater. The first floor was used for various civic purposes. Among other functions, it served as the city hall and library until the city vacated the building in 1973. After standing unoccupied several years, the building was restored by the Wallowa Bicentennial Committee in 1976, and it is now operated as the Wallowa County Museum.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The First Bank of Joseph is significant as an example of High Victorian Italianate architecture and as one of the earliest commercial structures in northeastern Oregon.

Wallowa County and the City of Joseph developed after the famous Nez Perce Indian War of 1877. Chief Joseph, for whom the town was named, lived with his tribe in the Wallowa Valley very near the town of Joseph. After the Indians were forced out of the area, white settlers moved in rapidly. By 1879 a new road was built into the Wallowa Valley with a stage line and by 1887 Wallowa County was formed. In that same year the First Bank of Joseph was organized with a capital stock of $25,000. By 1890 this amount was increased to $50,000.

The president of the bank was F.D. McCully, who had moved to the Wallowa Valley from Salem. McCully's connection with Salem and the Willamette Valley probably explains the sophisticated use of High Victorian Italianate architecture in the bank building. McCully lived in Salem when the Ladd and Bush Bank was constructed in 1869, and the elaborate Victorian detailing on this building no doubt influenced him.

Architecturally, the First Bank of Joseph building is one of the finest examples of the High Victorian Italianate commercial style in eastern Oregon. Many of the popular architectural styles during the late 1800s appeared in eastern Oregon, but they were usually vernacular interpretations of these styles. The First Bank of Joseph is not only an attractive building, but it is unusual as a pure example of the High Victorian Italianate style.
