78. When Restoration Was Not Restoration

These two photographs show the changes made in the appearance of San Carlos (Carmel) Mission at the time it was "restored" in 1884. The upper view shows the ruined church, the roof line of which met the facade behind the top of the arch. The towers both reached above the peak of the roof. The architect in planning restoration, disregarding the former lines, raised the tip of the roof some twelve feet thus destroying very largely the beauty of the Spanish architecture. In the later building the steep shingle roof dominates the whole structure, whereas the gentle sloping tiled roof of the padres was not more noticeable than the other features.
