DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Nathan Bedford Forrest Boyhood Home as it presently stands consists of two separate log structures joined by a frame addition. A second frame ell is attached to the rear of the one-story log portion.

The log portions of the dwelling are of cedar logs, hand=hewn or split with half dovetail notching. The spaces between the logs are filled with small pieces of limestone and daubed with a lime-clay mixture. The rafters, visible in the attic or sleeping loft, are cedar poles, joined at the apex with pegs; there is no ridge-pole. The purlins are vertically sawn slabs of un-barked cedar. The present roof is of galvanized or tinned sheet iron, but nail holes in the purlins and a number of hand-split and dressed shingles indicate an earlier wood roof.=The dry laid foundation, chimneys, and massive stone steps are of a very hard, cherty limestone.

The interior of the house is well finished with paneling, wainscoting and decorative mantels. The ground floor ceiling joists in the two-story wing are beaded along their lower margins.

From the historical evidence and on examination of the structure, it is possible to tentatively outline the sequence of construction. The log portions of the building probably date from the 1820s, with the two-story section, which appears to be of slightly rougher construction, possibly being constructed first. These two log sections were in all probability the only structures extant when the Forrests acquired the house. The economic status of the Forrest family was in those years not very high and it is unlikely that they made any alterations to the house during the three years of their ownership.

In 1833 William Forrest sold the property to Stephen W. Rainey. Oral accounts state that the Raineys made extensive alterations to the house. The present appearance of the house for the most part probably results from these alterations. The changes include the construction of the frame connector between the two log structures and the division into two rooms of the downstairs of the two-story log portion. Other changes probably include the addition of paneling, wainscoting and decorative mantels. The door to the right of the fireplace in the two-story section was closed from the inside at this time by the paneling and wainscoting, though it remains visible on the exterior. The alterations done at this time were apparently an attempt to change the simple frontier cabins into something larger, more comfortable, and more pretentious.

No historical evidence is available concerning the framed addition to the rear; however the use of wire nails, balloon framing, and built-up framing members suggests that it dates from the late nineteenth or early twentieth century.

At the present time the structure is deteriorating rapidly. Most of the clay daubing has been washed out of the spaces between the logs, the windows are gone, and water is entering the building at numerous places. Recently the house has been used for tobacco storage. The two log portions of the building with the connecting addition appear to be structurally sound and restorable.

There are also a number of outbuildings--a log barn, a smokehouse, and a log shed. These are probably not contemporaneous with the Forrest occupancy but are good examples of nineteenth-century farm outbuildings.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The most talented military leader that Tennessee, and perhaps the United States, ever produced was General Nathan Bedford Forrest of the Confederate Army. Born in Bedford (now Marshall) County, Tennessee, in 1821, Forrest's only military experience prior to 1861 was an abortive attempt to join the army of the Republic of Texas when he was twenty years old. During the period from 1841 to 1861 Forrest settled in the Memphis area and became a prominent and wealthy citizen, businessman, and planter, amassing a substantial fortune dealing in slaves, livestock and cotton.

In 1861 Forrest, at forty years of age, joined Captain Josiah White's Tennessee Mounted Rifles as a private. However, his prominence in civilian life dictated that he be given a command of his own. In a few short weeks he received a commission as a lieutenant colonel and was authorized to raise his own company. Over the next four years Forrest acquired a reputation of invincibility among both his own men and the enemy. Though often misused and mistrusted by the professional soldiers of the Confederate high command for the strong streak of insubordination that Forrest often evinced, he always enjoyed the respect and begrudging admiration of his opponents. This was perhaps best illustrated by the sobriquet "that Devil Forrest" frequently applied to him by General Sherman. Sherman elaborated:

He had never read a military book in his life, knew nothing about tactics, could not even drill a company, but he had a genius for strategy which was original and to me incomprehensible. There was no theory or art of war by which I could calculate with any degree of certainty what Forrest was up to. He always seemed to know what I was doing or intended to do.<sup>1</sup>

Of Forrest's younger years, only the barest outlines and several anecdotes are known. His grandfather, Nathan Forrest, settled in what became Marshall County in 1808 when William Forrest was ten years old. William Forrest married in 1820 and Nathan Bedford Forrest, named for his grandfather, was his first born child. The house in which General Forrest was born, according to a source interviewed in the nineteenth century by one of Forrest's first biographers, was torn down. In 1830 William Forrest acquired a tract of land from a Mr. W. S. Mayfield. The log and frame structure which still stands on this property is the only home still existing associated with Forrest. It was young Forrest's home for three years. In 1833 William Forrest sold the property and moved his family to Mississippi.

The house also possesses architectural significance. According to tradition the earliest portions of it were built by W. S. Mayfield in the early 1820s. It is a substantial log and frame structure typical of many such structures of the late pioneer period in Tennessee. While most houses in the more settled sections of the state in the 1820s were brick or frame, the farmer or craftsman of the rural areas was still likely to build with logs. Often when prosperity increased, rather than build a new and more imposing house, improvements and additions were made to the log structure. This was done to the Forrest home probably in the 1830s by the Rainey family, who acquired the property in 1833. The Nathan Bedford Forrest Boyhood Home is thus highly representative of the folk architecture of a particular time and place in Tennessee history.
