Pleasant Hill Church
Cass County, Indiana

Architectural Description

Pleasant Hill Church is a gable-front, brick building with white wooden trim and a white clapboard belfry. The church sits on the southeast corner of a nearly flat 1/4 acre lot carved out of a cultivated field. The hill on which the church stands overlooks Keeps Creek, and the building sometimes is known locally as Keeps Creek Church. A small cemetery occupies the right side of the lot and part of the space in front of the building. No outbuildings stand on the property. The lot itself does not contain any trees, but a distant row of trees frames the farmer's field in which the church lot is located. A blacktopped country road runs along the front of the church.

Two contributing resources exist on the site; the church (building) and the cemetery (site).

The church was vacant for a long time and its windows were boarded up, but has been recently restored. The belfry was rebuilt, a new roof put on in 1989, and the interior refurbished. Very little new material was necessary, as the original fabric was fairly intact.

The church is built on a simple, symmetrical, rectangular plan, 50' x 33'. It is built of red bricks that were made on the premises of local clay, as was common practice at the time. Its decorative features are Italianate in style. The foundation is made of stone blocks topped with a 6" concrete slab. Two to three courses of stone are visible above ground level. The concrete slab projects slightly from the stones. The moderately-pitched gable roof has a slight overhang and is covered in composition shingles. A wide frieze board follows the roof line on all elevations, giving a slight Greek Revival effect. Four shallow concrete steps lead from the front entrance to an overgrown, broken concrete sidewalk that extends to the road.

The main facade contains the front entrance and two windows, one placed on each side of the door. All of the windows in the building are long, narrow, 4-over-4 sash windows, with segmental arches made of two rows of headers, and concrete sills. Simple architrave trim surrounds the windows and door. The door and all of the wooden trim around the windows and roof line are painted white. The front entrance is a panelled double door topped by a segmental arch transom of two lights. The door and windows have hoods formed by a protruding row of brick headers, at whose ends are tapered brick pendants. Located equidistantly between the door and the windows, and at all four corners of the building, are shallow buttresses the thickness of one brick. A protruding frieze of bricks, level with the buttresses and consisting of three rows of stretchers and one row of headers, runs below the wooden frieze on the front and side elevations. Above the door is a semi-circular stone framed with a row of headers. The lettering reads:

The Church at Pleasant Hill

J. Eyman

M.P. Klepinger

Trustees

The belfry is about 8' tall and sits at the front of the church on the peak of the gable. Its low base is made of horizontal boards and is approximately 4'x4' square. The belfry is symmetrical, with one louvered opening in each side. Simple pilasters trim each corner and a wide frieze board runs under the roof line. Italianate brackets, four on each side, decorate the cornice. The low-pitched pyramidal roof is covered in asphalt shingles and is topped by an 8' wooden spire which is 1' in diameter at the base and tapers to 2" at the top.

Both side elevations of the church are identical. Four windows, the same as on the main facade, are evenly spaced along each wall, separated by the shallow buttresses. The left side has a chimney placed near the edge of the roof, in line with the central buttress. The right side has ivy growing between and partially obscuring the two rearmost windows.

The rear elevation shows a plain brick wall with no openings. The only features are the wooden frieze board and the corner buttresses. A few ivy plants grow up the rear of the building and some lilies and other flowers are planted along the base of the wall, extending around the corners and a short way down the two side walls.

The interior of the church is very plain. The walls are plastered and painted white. A 13" high baseboard, painted light brown, runs along all of the walls and is topped with a 3" walnut molding. The windows are surrounded by a narrow chair rail molding similar to that on the baseboards. The inside of the front door has walnut or brown-painted trim around the doorframe and its panels. The floor is constructed of pine boards that range from 3" to 5" in width. The ceiling is a Tudor arch-shaped barrel vault, plastered and painted the same color as the walls.

At the rear of the church is a platform that extends the full width of the interior. It extends 9' 3" out from the wall and is 16" high. One full-width step leads up to the platform. Fourteen wooden pews of simple design were purchased from an abandoned church in 1992 to replace the originals. A newly-constructed wooden pulpit is of similar design to the pews and sits in the center of the platform. There is no other interior ornament or artwork. There is no heat or electricity in the building. Iron fixtures at the windows originally held kerosene lamps.

The cemetery has been in continuous use since the church was built. The lots are laid out in straight rows, with most of the graves on the south side of the building. A few graves are located at the front and the rear of the church. Many of the modern gravestones are of granite, while most of the 19th c. and early 20th c. stones appear to be made of marble or limestone. Two of the most common types of pre-1940 monuments are tall obelisks and small, flat stones with rounded tops.

Statement of Significance

Pleasant Hill Church is eligible for the National Register under Criterion A in the area of religion, and Criterion C, architecture. Its importance in the area of religion comes from its original use as a meeting place for three different denominations. Architecturally, it is significant as the best existing example of a late 19th c. one-room country church in Cass County. The church meets Criterion Consideration A because of its local significance in the areas of architecture and religion.

Pleasant Hill Church represents a workable solution to the problem of constructing a church for small congregations in a sparsely-settled rural area. All three denominations that banded together to build Pleasant Hill had been holding services in Clinton Township since about 1840. The Dunkards began holding quarterly meetings in 1839 at the Klepinger or Shideler farmsteads. The New Lights and Campbellites, who were fewer in number, met irregularly in the southern part of the township. The dates given in the Cass County history for the first meetings of these denominations (and also of the Baptists, who began holding meetings in Logansport in 1841) coincide with the popularity of religious revivals sweeping the nation at this time. Pleasant Hill is the only known 19th century church in the county which was built as a cooperative effort by several congregations. It is also interesting to note that a central doctrine of the Christian Church groups was to unite Protestant sects and dissolve dogmatic boundaries between denominations. Obviously, this is reflected in this cooperative effort.

When a congregation grew large enough to make meetings at the homes of members impractical, it might seek to construct its own building. Probably none of the three denominations occupying Pleasant Hill Church had so many members that a special building was necessary, but by 1875, even the smaller congregations in Cass County had built or were in the process of building their own churches. Pleasant Hill was only the third church building to be constructed in Clinton Township. The Methodists erected the first one, about 1857-8. The Lutherans built a church in the 1860s, and Pleasant Hill followed in 1875. The land for Pleasant Hill Church was part of a farm owned by James and Mary Justice, whose descendants and kin still live and own much of the land in this area. At one time, the District #3 grade school stood across the road from the church; together, the two buildings were a focus for community activity.

The original deed to the church property was made out to three men as trustees of the denominations responsible for the building: Michael Klepinger of the "Christian Church commonly known as the New Lights;" James Justice of the "Christian Church commonly known as the Campbellites;" and Jacob Eyman of the "Church of God commonly known as the Dunkard Church." Each of these three denominations was allowed to control the building and its use for one week out of every month, beginning on Friday night. The fourth week was reserved for the use of "all other orthodox denominations." When not otherwise occupied, the building was available for any other purpose that was "not in any way or character immoral in its tendencies."

The cooperation among the three denominations made it possible to build a sturdy, brick building that might have been difficult, if not impossible, for any one of them to have constructed individually. Since all three were accustomed to holding services at irregular intervals, it was not difficult for them to share the building. Although they had differences in doctrine, the denominations were not radically dissimilar in their basic beliefs; all three were Protestant sects that flourished after the Second Great Awakening.

The last service at Pleasant Hill was held in 1909 and was a funeral for one of its members. In 1939, surviving members of each of the three denominations voted to transfer control of the building and the cemetery to the Pleasant Hill Cemetery Association. Although the cemetery was still in use, the building fell into disrepair and was used only for storage. In the 1980s, the Pleasant Hill Church Association began restoring the building. It is now used for the annual meeting of the Cemetery Association and is available for the public to view as a restored example of a 19th c. country church.

Pleasant Hill is also important architecturally as the most intact example of a one-room, 19th c. rural church in Cass County (Unfortunately, it was only rated "Notable" in the Cass County Interim Report; the building was restored after the survey was performed). Only two other brick, one-room rural churches remain in the county; one is in ruins and the other has had a modern vestibule added. The county's other small rural churches are usually frame with wood siding. According to the survey, most churches in the county's urban areas or in small towns are not built on a simple, rectangular plan, and usually have at least one of the following: vestibules, basements, colored glass, bell towers, and additional Sunday School or meeting rooms. Pleasant Hill is a good example of the simple architecture and interior design favored by some of the smaller Protestant sects of the 19th century. The building's integrity is probably due to two reasons: the congregation's abandonment of the building as a church, but the continuing use of the building for storage and continuing use of the cemetery. Since the last service was held in 1909, there was no reason for modern alterations or additions to be constructed for a growing congregation. As there was no stained glass or expensive furnishings that could have been sold or vandalized, the simple interior also remained intact.
