Montauk Mound is the largest of three Mississippian-period mounds in the area near the junction of the Rolling Fork and Deer Creek. Its extreme elevation in relation to the surrounding area effected a natural strategic position in the Steele Bayou expedition. Admiral David D. Porter reported that the mound was sixty feet high, but it is not known if this measurement was taken from the level of Deer Creek or from the surrounding fields, because the mound is only about fifteen feet high today. The discrepancy is due in part to natural erosion, but the primary reason for the difference in the 1863 and 1973 measurement is the result of a vast amount of alluvial fill that has been deposited in the fields by past flooding. For a number of years the site has been used to pasture horses and cattle.

The ancient Indian mound, referred to as the Montauk Mound by Captain John McClure of the 55th Ohio Infantry, serves as a monument to the failure of a joint army-navy expedition to reach the Yazoo River by traveling through a series of bayous and creeks. If the expedition had been successful a direct assault on the Confederate fortifications on the Yazoo River above Vicksburg could possibly have forced the surrender of the city four months earlier. With this objective in mind, Major-General Ulysses S. Grafit approached Acting Rear-Admiral David D. Porter with his plan. Porter agreed to cooperate in the venture with Grant's favorite subordinate, Major-General William T. Sherman.

Porter steamed into the Yazoo on March 14, 1863, with five city class gumboats, four mortar boats and four tugs. His plan was to move the fleet from its base on the Mississippi River into the Yazoo, then enter Steele's Bayou. From Steele's Bayou, the fleet would navigate the narrow Little Black Bayou into Deer Creek at Hill's Plantation, where it would join Sherman's infantry. The combined force would then proceed up Deer Creek to the Rolling Fork, which flowed into the Sunflower River, then move downstream to re-enter the Yazoo above the fortifications at Snyder's Bluff.

At Hill's Plantation, Porter told Sherman he would need at least two regiments to accompany his fleet. In order to supply the necessary troops Sherman had to order forward more of his division from Eagle Bend to occupy Hill's Plantation. Because the distance to Rolling Fork was substantially more by water than by land, Porter set his fleet into motion ahead of the infantry, believing that both would arrive at the Rolling Fork at approximately the same time.

The fleet made faster time up Deer Creek than expected until it was within seven miles of the fork. Here Porter was informed by local Negroes that Confederates were obstructing the creek with trees. The tug Thistle and the gunboat Corondelet moved forward to clear the trees and prevent further obstruction of the passage. It proved to be a difficult and dangerous task because Confederate sharpshooters, hidden in the woods, harassed the workers at every opportunity. However, progress was made until the fleet was within eight hundred yards of the fork. With only two trees remaining to be removed, Porter halted for the night near an Indian mound and awaited the arrival of the infantry. A battery from the gunboats was positioned at the mound, and pickets were posted around the perimeter of the field.

Admiral Porter soon realized a predicament when smoke was reported moving along the Sunflower River, because the activity indicated steamers bringing Confederate infantry to contest the Union advance. To compound Porter's problems, he learned that the enemy was again felling trees in the rear of the fleet. Thus, he gave orders to prepare the fleet for destruction in case capture became imminent.

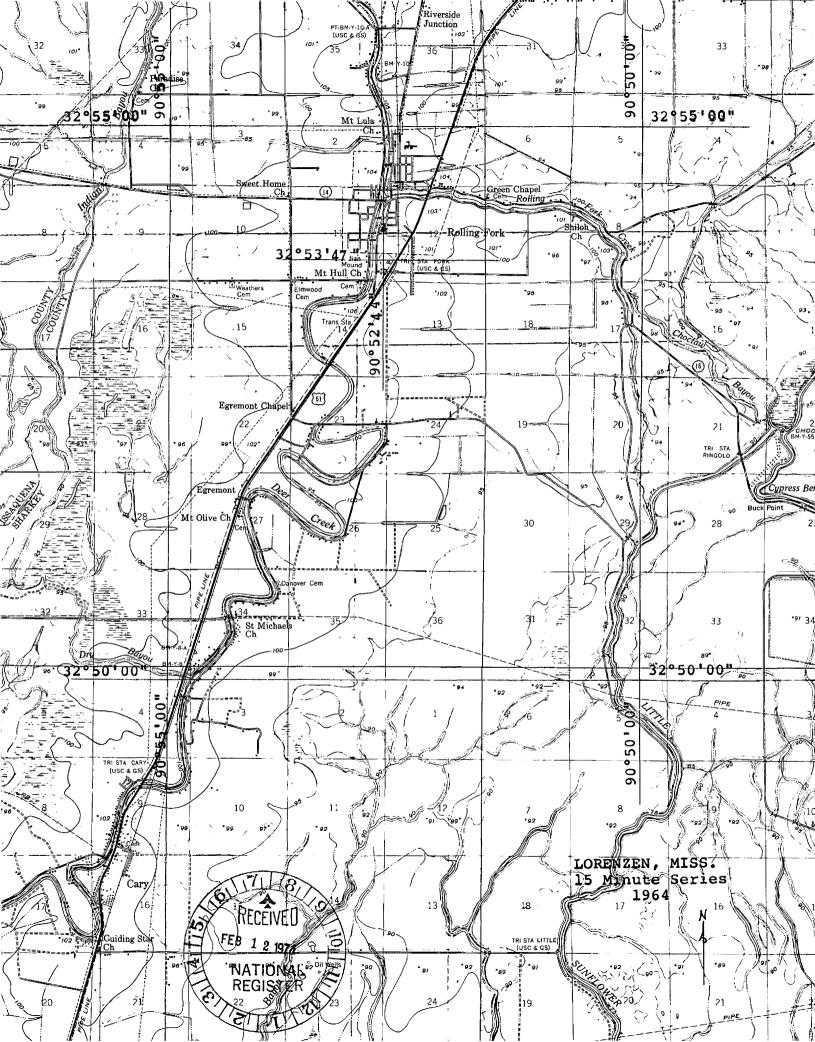

About sunset, the Confederates under Brigadier-General Winfield S. Featherston drove in the Federal pickets and forced the withdrawal of the battery from the mound. A section of Confederate artillery immediately occupied the mound, and during the night exchanged shots with the fleet until its limbers were nearly depleted and the fleet began to retreat.

The sound of firing brought the Federal infantry at a rapid march, and their timely appearance saved the fleet from certain capture or self-The Confederates, who numbered no more than eight-hundred, destruction. were content to limit their activity to brief skirmishes with the Federal infantry and to harass the fleet with sharpshooters who fired at anyone careless enough to expose himself on deck or in a gun port.

The Union fleet finally arrived back at Hill's Plantation on March 24, 1863, and abandoned all attempts to circumnavigate the Confederate fortifications on the Yazoo. General Grant now had little choice but to move his men below Vicksburg along the Louisiana side. On the night of April 16, Porter ran his fleet past the Vickburg batteries.

The obstinate stand made by the Confederates at Montauk Mound, and the near capture of his fleet caused Porter to remark in his report: "I never knew how helpless a thing an ironclad could be when unsupported by troops."
