In Greenwood county is the site of the once-flourishing Colonial village of Ninety Six, renamed Cambridge after the Revolution (see enclosed plan "A"). Even before 1730, the fork lying 96 miles south of the Cherokee Indian town of Keowee was an important place on the Cherokee Trail. Later the site of a frontier trading post and of Indian and Revolutionary War fortifications, Ninety Six was also a busy courthouse town, its gaol and courthouse described as brick buildings. It has also been described as a "snug little village of 15 or 20 houses and stores." As many as 17 stores were noted at one point...and the population included "4 merchants, as many lawyers, hotel keepers, tailor, black-smith, carriage and harness shops, and three physicians...there was also belonging to the place a large and well-selected library, and a flourishing academy...there was a church there..."

In the early 1750s, Indian trader Robert Gouedy settled at Ninety Six, his land grant lying astride the Cherokee Path, which later ran through the center of town. Gouedy's store was supposedly the largest above the fall line. Extan from this period is the grave of Gouedy's son James, in a wooded area south of Star Fort and perhaps near the site of the original Gouedy homeplace.

Gov. William Henry Lyttleton's 1759 expedition built a fort around Gouedy' barn, and this stockade, described as 90' square, provided protection of settlers from a wide surrounding area.

First of the town's Revolutionary fortifications was built in November 1775 at Colonel Savage's plantation, or Savage's Old Field. Separated from Ninety Six courthouse and gaol by a ravine and spring, this was a "temporary stockade fort of fence rails, straws, beeves' hides and other such materials. a square of about 185 yards...the curtains of defense extended from a barn and store to some outhouses; and at a distance of 250 yards from the gaol."

When the British occupied Ninety Six in 1780, they added fortifications to the existing stockådé. Major defensive feature was a redoubt on the southeast tip of the yillage. This was Star Fort and it was surrounded by a ditch. Three cannon on wheels strengthened the earthwork fort from within. The entire village was surrounded by a stockade, and the gaol was fortified. Further strengthening was added by an embankment of earth surrounding the village and by abatis, a type of defense using felled trees with the branched ends sticking outward. Within the village, blockhouses were erected and covered ways built for safe communication. On the north side of the village a small stream supplied the garrison with water. A stockade fort with two blockhouses was built to defend the stream on the side opposite the village palisade. A covered way led to the stream between these two strong points (See enclosed sketch "B" and survey "C"). Added to the military engineering of the British was that of the besieging American forces: three parallels,tw $lackbr{\phi}$ trenches, a mine reaching almost to the Star Fort ditch, two log towers for firing into the fort.

The 1964 National Survey of Historic Sites and Buildings (COLONIALS AND PATRIOTS) describes Star Fort as "an earthwork with eight salients and eight reentrant angles, enclosing about one-half acre northeast of the village."

This same authority reports that "The Star Fort outlines are still readily discernible as earthwork embankments 4 or 5 feet high. Scattered brick fragments mark the location of the town, which was burned by the British, later rebuilt but lost its court in 1800 and declined in importance. Some identifiable remains include the knoll on which the 1775 siege occurred and on which stood the British stockade fort of 1781, the ravine in which flowed the stream supplying water to the garrison, the jail site, the old Charleston road, and some distance from the village site, the 1759 fortification."

(d) The 1775 mission to the back country by William Henry Drayton and the Rev. William Tennent, sent from Charleston by the Council of Safety to explain the American-British disputes and to enlist patriot aid.

(3) As a Revolutionary War stronghold and also as a focal point of violent Patriot-Tory strife.

Pre-Revolutionary activity included the raising of a Ranger troop in the Ninety Six area (June 1775) which made the first overt act of the Revolution in South Carolina - the July 1775 seizure of Fort Charlotte from the British. Ranger commander was James Mayson, who lived near Ninety Six village. In August 1775, Ninety Six District sent nine representatives to the Second Provincial Congress. One of these was Commander Mayson.

The Revolution's first land battle south of New England took place at Ninety Six, Nov. 19-21, 1775. Patriot forces, besieged inconclusively, finally defeated and dispersed the Tories in December. In this battle, James Birmingham was the first South Carolina patriot to give up his life in the Revolution. Andrew Pickens, who later became one of South Carolina's three famous partisan generals, was a company commander in this action.

Old Ninety Six reached the peak of its fame in 1780-81 when it was a British garrison and scene of the siege of Star Fort, one of the most interesting and spectacular operations of the Revolution's closing months.

In 1779, the British returned to their earlier plan of trying to roll up the states from south to north, and after the 1780 capture of Charlestown, ordered three expeditions to the interior to gain control of the state.

Ninety Six became important as the most advanced British post, supporting the other two posts, at Augusta and Camden, also covering loyalist settlements and serving as a recruiting depot for Tory fighters.

by regulars and Tories, until May-June 1781, when Gen. Nathanael Greene's American force invested and assaulted the fort. The siege was unsuccessful NACC since the fort's star form gave the enemy complete command and exposed the attackers to close cross-fire. Advancing British reinforcements spurred American withdrawal. The British, however, evacuated the fort at the end of the 27-day siege. This relinquishment of the inland South Carolina foothold helped weaken the south-to-north British offensive and was a contributing factor to the war's outcome.

Associated with Old Ninety Six are such historically significant names as Patrick Calhoun (father of John C.), Andrew Pickens, and Sen. John Lewis Gervais, who was instrumental in changing the state capital from Charleston.

In post-Revolutionary years, Ninety Six achieved some importance as a college town. Site of one of three colleges authorized by the S.C. General Assembly in March 1785, the town changed its name to Cambridge in 1787 in honor of the college. The institution enjoyed no lasting success, however, and by the mid-1820s, the once-flourishing town had almost ceased to exist.

The importance of Ninety Six and Star Fort in South Carolina and American history is indicated by the great amount of written material on the subject. An example is the enclosed bibliography (see enclosure "D") which was used in the 1960 sketch published by the Greenwood County Historical Society. The Society is currently negotiating for the property and laying plans for developing the site, a project which has considerable private and governmental support.

An ambitious town plan providing ten blocks of eight lots each was laid out for Cambridge, the post-Revolutionary name of the village that had originally been called Ninety Six. The indication of squares or blocks in the area designated as "Common's Where the old Town Formerly Stood" is an illusion—the old map was folded over and some of the ink from the blocks of the new town was transferred to the old town area.—From collection of the South Carolina Archives Commission.

village so much so that a surveyor was employed to lay out the town. The road leading from Cambridge creek to Ninety Six was designated as Broad street, with cross streets running at right angles. The writer has in his possession a map of the then village of Cambridge. The British having burnt down the town

This sketch of Ninety Six and Star Fort was published in 1822 in Johnson's Life of Nathanael Greene and has been copied in several later publications: Lossing's Field Book of the Revolution, 1860; McCrady's South Carolina in the Revolution, 1902 (from which the above plan was drawn); Roberts' Oliver Wiswell, 1940; and Ward's War of the Revolution, 1952. Roberts said the design resembled a child's drawing of a seated cat, with the fort as the head, the village as the body, and the covered passage to the small stockade as the tail.

Accurate details of Star Fort at old Ninety Six are shown in this plan of the fort as surveyed Nov. 15, 1921 by Thomas C. Andersen, civil engineer. It is still surrounded by several acres of woodland. (Contrary to the caption on the surveyor's plat, Star Fort was not called "Fort Ninety Six".)
