Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Anderson-Thompson House faces north on the crest of a hill amidst century-old trees overlooking the countryside southeast of Indianapolis. The house is ell-shaped in plan with a parlor wing on the east side. The house originally had a summer kitchen and ice house on the west side which connected with the kitchen (see photo 1), but this wing has been removed.

The sill and supporting crossmembers of the house are comprised of 8" x 10" hand-hewn oak timbers held together with wooden pegs. There are 1½ floors plus a basement with 11 rooms in all. The house has 10 ft. ceilings on the first floor and 9 ft. gabled ceilings on the second floor.

The foundation is low and is constructed of brick. On the main facade the foundation has one centrally-located window opening and on the east side of the parlor wing there are two window openings.

The exterior of the house is finished with oak board-and-batten siding. In 1938 the owner applied asbestos siding which, in recent years, has been removed and the original siding restored. The original board siding experienced very little damage from the asbestos siding; however, many of the batten strips have been replaced with strips lathed in an identical pattern to the original ones. The house is painted in its original shades of brown, fawn, and dark green.

The main gable and facade of the house has three bays, with the entrance in the easternmost bay (photo 2). The entrance has a wooden door with round-arched panels and plain trim (photo 6). The door frame has ancons at the top, and the same form mirrored below at the sill level. A rectangular transom and a low, projecting, pedimented hood are above the door. While the door and transom are original, the canopy is not. Th historic photo (photo 1) shows a similar, but wider, canopy set several inches above the transom, supported by brackets. A front porch was added in the 1930s but was recently removed. At the entrance are hand-cut limestone steps which were apparently moved from the front to the rear entrance, but which now have been returned to the front.

There are two windows west of the door, and the upper story has one window opening. The window sash were changed around 1930 from six-over-six to one-over-one, double-hung windows (three windows at 34" x 78" on the second floor and seven windows at 34" x 66" on the first floor). At this time, first floor windows were shortened by about 12". Scars can be seen on the board siding, indicating the original height of the windows. The windows were, until recently, trimmed with plain board surrounds and sills. The current owner has, however, installed window heads similar to the originals, i.e., low pediments extending slightly beyond the edges of the vertical trim. Also, antique louvered shutters have been installed on the front windows, similar to the originals.

A stained glass window of smaller dimensions than the windows on the main facade is on the eastern side of the main section of the house. The north elevation of the adjacent parlor wing has recently been restored to its original configuration, using the original door and window which had been stored in the basement. A new porch similar to the original has also been reinstalled on this elevation.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Anderson-Thompson House is architecturally significant as one of few local examples of Gothic Revival architecture. Its prominent, steeply-pitched gables and ornately carved brackets, and its original board-and-batten siding make it stylistically one of a scant number of Gothic Revival houses in the Indianapolis area. The house was also the last residence of James Lee Thompson, a civic leader.

The house was built by Stephen H. Anderson, who was born in Kentucky in 1815 (2)*. In 1848 he purchased the tract of land consisting of 160 acres from Duly Masters, a land speculator in Boone County, Kentucky. Anderson built his house c. 1855–1860, based upon census and tax records. He located it at the highest point of land on one of Franklin Township's earliest roads, Shelbyville Road. Shelbyville Road was a toll road during the 1870s and 1880s, operated by the Indianapolis and Shelbyville Gravel Road Company. One of the toll gates was located approximately 600 feet from the house at the southeast corner of Southport Road and Shelbyville Road (3). Ledger records of the gravel company show that Anderson was paid for scraping the road on several occasions (4).

Anderson and his family farmed the land until its sale in 1891 to James Lee Thompson (1818–1899), a farmer and civic leader. His father, Wilson Thompson, was a Baptist minister, farmer, physician, and Representative for two terms in the Indiana Legislature (5, 6). James Lee was born in Hamilton County, Ohio, in 1818 and as a boy moved to Fayette County, Indiana, in 1834. Thompson married Elizabeth McCarty in 1839. He moved to Rush County, Indiana, where he lived for three years, then to Clinton County, and later to Howard County, where he purchased 80 acres in 1852 (7). His wife, Elizabeth, died and his five children went to live with Grandfather McCarty. He then married Eliza Heffner, who lived for one year following their marriage. In 1861 Thompson married Nancy Adair Kemper, a widow who had one son, Joseph Kemper. Federal census and Marion County land records indicate that Stephen H. Anderson was the legal guardian for Joseph Kemper, who lived with the Andersons in 1870. Six children were born of Thompson's marriage to Nancy (7). James Lee Thompson was a sergeant in the 4th Cavalry of the 77th Regiment during the Civil War (8). Thompson settled in Marion County in 1867 and served three terms as Franklin Township (Marion County) Trustee (1868–74 and 1878–80) (9), and one term as Representative in the Indiana Legislature (1875) (5). He served two terms as Marion County Commissioner (1887–89), and was given a gold-headed cane by fellow commissioners (7). In politics, it was said that "he was a staunch Democrat, one not ashamed to stand up before the world and avow the principles of his party through good and through evil report" (10). Thompson moved to the Anderson 80-acre farm from the Irvington district of Indianapolis. Thompson was an elder of the Old Piner Primitive Baptist Church, which stood adjacent to the property. He died in 1899 and was buried in Acton Cemetery. An inventory in the Probate Court records of Marion County lists the house's furnishings. Nancy Thompson lived in the house until her death in 1904, and her children sold the house in 1906.

The east elevation of the parlor wing has a gabled roof, with two windows on the first level and one on the upper level, identical to those on the main facade. The rear (south) elevation has an entrance in the westernmost bay, and three windows on the ground floor, including one in the parlor wing (photo 5). On the second story is a single window centered in the gable end, and a large shed dormer with one window on the roof of the parlor wing.

The gabled roof on both the north and south elevations has decorative scroll brackets, and exposed rafters in the eaves, which are cut in a curved configuration.

The first floor hallway connects with the parlor to the east, and the stairway, library, and dining room to the west. The dining room leads to the kitchen at the southwest corner of the house. There are plaster ceiling medallions in the dining room, hallway, and parlor. The rear entrance to the house, a red brick and concrete veranda, leads into the kitchen.

All doors in the house are carved without separate moldings and have iron locks that bear March 15, 1859, patent dates. The doors off the hallway on both the first and second floors have transom windows. The interior woodwork around the windows and doors is of blue ash, and features low pedimented heads (photo 9). The original floors were also of ash, but oak floors were added to the first floor around 1930.

An elegantly carved, open oak stairway leads from the first floor to an 8' x 13' landing on the second floor (photo 8). The second floor has three bedrooms; two are on either side of the landing, with one smaller bedroom over the library. A washroom and closet were added off the master bedroom in recent years.

The original crib, with board-and-batten siding matching that of the house, stands on the adjacent property to the north, which is under separate ownership. The original bar was moved approximately 700 feet in 1935, and remains today on the 6700 block of Shelbyville Road. An original cistern remains on the west side of the house, with an "1865" inscription chiseled into the wall.
