DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (II known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This early 18th century two story Dutch Colonial farmhouse, a rarity in this area, has the standard two door, two window front facade with two room plan, split by a center wall. Four modern windows, two of which replace the original ones at the left side of each door, open up these large chambers, whose end walls are filled with fireplaces. In the middle of the west wall, which retains the original hand split three foot long shingles, sits the eight foot high masonry fireplace back. Under the modern box cornice on the front wall remain four strips of the original rough grained beaded clapboard, while below this lies late 19th century circular sawn clapboards. The carpenter alternated the directions of the rough circular saw marks, producing a herringbone effect. The north wall also displays wide rough grained clapboards, which are unbeaded.

The question arises whether the whole house, with its back roof extended down and back over a shed area, thus creating the "saltbox" form, was built at one time or in two phases. Various factors suggest the later conclusion. The masonry basement wall stands six feet in from the back or lower side of the house. The floor joists of the first floor run longitudinally, braced by heavy oak lateral beams in the front two thirds of the house, whereas the back section's support run laterally. The east wall's rough clapboards of the oldest type stop at a certain vertical line, where the shed could have been later joined to the house. The champfered 6 by 10 inch beams under the second floor differ from the square edge 6 by 8 inch ones in the back.

It would seem that the house was enlarged to the rear and improved inside, either concurrently or separately, sometime after Welling bought it, perhaps as his family expanded. The interior shows much larger unit panelling than one could expect in this area about 1730 or 1740. The fireplace wall of the living room in particular shows unusually proportioned and arranged panels that betray the imagination of a capable itinerant joiner. Two three panel doors by the same hand swing in the "borning room", on the left side of the shed addition. Furthermore, there are several other four and five unit doors throughout the house about the same period. The two front doors, which are cut in half and hung on hand wrought strap hinges below four and five light transoms, have six panels and triple piping molding. This same work reappears on the cabinets behind the old kitchen fireplace and may date slightly later.

The original huge fireplace with oak beam lintel in the living room was filled in during the 18th century with a very wide elliptical brick arch over square and diagonal recessed jambs. This improvement can perhaps be assigned to c.1740. The original kitchen fireplace, now a dining room, was long ago closed up and veneered with a Federal style mantle piece.

The tiny "borning room" in the back left part of the house displays a corner fireplace with bowed mantle and reeded panels decorated by notching in Adamesque patterns, c.1800. This feature corresponds to a full blown version in the neighboring John D. Hart house, suggesting that the work was done at one time by a traveling craftsman, who was also responsible for similar mantles in the John White Homestead in Lawrenceville. (Continued)

Reading and James Trent, Commissioners of the Loan office. During the Revolutionary War the village was occupied by British and Hessian troops. Tradition states that an alert resident took a Hessian soldier captive and held him prisoner in a small room in this house. Welling died in 1790.

His great granddaughter Elizabeth Welling married John D. Hart as her second husband. He built, perhaps shortly after that occasion, the clapboard house next door. The executors of Hart, James Stevenson and Simon W. Phillips, conveyed the property to Charles Welling by deed on April 3, 1839. It remained in the Welling family until 1921. During the 19th century it served as a tenant house. Former Congressman Charles Howell and his wife have lived there since 1928.

This Dutch clapboard and shingle house is one of the last remaining of its kind in Mercer County. It documents house construction of the 1720s. in this area and injects a non-English strain into the area's building heritage. It shows a fascinating "modernization", probably of the first half of that century half of that century. It has come down to us in fairly well preserved condition with most half its/18th century interior features.

Upstairs there are two large bedrooms and two small chambers under the back of the house.

Some of the interior walls are clay with horse hair, sandwiched between hand split lath. Original hand wrought iron hardware peppers the doors. Old shingles, of the same variety as those on the west wall, survive under the present copper roof. An old spring house of recently reconstituted random masonry sits in front of the house while a smokehouse, dated 1810, with stone block walls and fragrant charred wood beams stands to the rear.
