CONTINUATION SHEET 8 ITEM NUMBER 7 PAGE 1

The Key West Historic District is the physical manifestation of the 160 year existence of one of Florida's most important cities. This approximately 190 block district contains the greatest and most important concentration of wooden buildings in Florida. Contained within the boundaries of the district is a collection of approximately 3,100 buildings noted for their consistency of general features and their diversity of details. Instead of describing the outstanding examples of each style of building within the district, there follows a discussion of the collection as a whole. Generally these buildings date from the period of 1886 to 1912, however they represent the known building tradition of Key West from 1838. This was a tradition of wood frame construction of one, one-and-one half, two and two-and-one-half story buildings, set on piers and exhibiting the general proportions and features of Classical Revival buildings built throughout Florida. Over the years Key Westers added vernacular versions of ornament associated with high-style design to the main building block; for the most part the proportion and massing of the block remained unaltered. The buildings of the district are an extreme example of conservative local building practice.

The City of Key West occupies a small island of the same name located near the western terminus of the Florida Keys. The Keys are a string of islands which extend in a southwesterly arc from the Florida peninsula to the Dry Tortugas. Physically, the island of Key West measures approximately three and one half miles in length by one mile in width. The island has a mean elevation of eight feet above sea level. It has no prominent topographical features. A deepwater channel off the western shore of the island provides the City with a good natural harbor.

The physical composition of the island consists mainly of shallow marl soil on limestone. There are no significant deposits of building stone on the island nor does it appear that hardwoods occurred in appreciable numbers. Key West formerly contained several tidal salt ponds which were utilized in the island's salt industry and later filled in the course of the island's development. <sup>2</sup> A limited amount of underground fresh water was originally available on the island.

Key West has a mild sub-tropical climate with an average annual temperature of 77°. Precipitation averages 39-40 inches annually, the majority occurring during the summer months. Humidity levels remain high throughout the year, particularly during the winter months. Although major hurricanes have struck Key West in 1847 and in 1935, these storms do not frequently threaten the island. The City is frost-free. <sup>3</sup>

Key West is located at latitude 24° 33' North; Longitude 81° 48' West, or approximately 90 miles north of Cuba and 150 miles southwest of Miami. Access to the island during the period of significance was by boat. From 1912 to 1935 there was rail access on the Overseas Railway. Since the late 1930s there has been air and automobile access.

The present day street pattern of Key West appears to be the direct successor of the February, 1829 survey of William A. Whitehead. The original street plan was oriented to the northwest with Wall and Front Streets running parallel to the shoreline. One block further inland Whitehead's plan became a consistent grid of streets running northwest/southeast and northeast/southwest; the grid was five blocks deep (nw/se) and thirteen blocks wide (ne/sw). Several blocks (6/7, 8/9, 13/14) close to the water were subdivided by alleys approximately forty feet wide which ran parallel to the nw/se streets. Southeast of this 258 acre "Town Plot" designated by blocks was the further subdivision of an area of approximately 765 acres into 30 tracts, most of which (500 acres and tracts 3-7, 10-14, 16-19) are in the historic district.

The boundary lines of these tracts were not always extensions of the streets of the Town Plot. However, the tract lines were often used at later dates as the rights of way, and account for some of the interrupted and offset street pattern in the district today. The 1846 map of Key West <sup>4</sup> shows a tidal pond covering major portions of blocks 6/7, 13/14 and 15. This map also shows a number of buildings set immediately adjacent to the street and clustered in the vicinity of the harbor area. One church is indicated at the west corner of block 37 and the U.S. Barracks are shown at the site of the present Peary Court. Tracks meander through undeveloped blocks, and there are a scattering of buildings as far south as Southard Street.

The 1847 update of Whitehead's plan <sup>5</sup> designated several public spaces not previously indicated. These include the Custom House in block 4 and fronting on Clinton Place -- a triangular intersection of Front, Greene and Whitehead Streets. The Court House and Goal are shown in Jackson Square, the block formed by Whitehead, Thomas, Fleming and Southard Streets. The Marine Hospital is shown facing the water in the area southwest of block 40. A large tract of land south of the Marine Hospital is described as United States (sic) Land; this is part of the site of the present Truman Naval Station. Mallory Square is not indicated on the map. Several wharves are named and ownership of all lots of the original area north of Angela Street are indicated with either the name or initial of the owner. The tidal salt pond does not appear on the map nor do the irregular roadways.

In 1850 another map by Bache <sup>6</sup> reverts to some of the items shown in 1846. These items include the tidal salt pond (now restricted to blocks 6/7 and 13/14) and a number of lanes. With the exception of Whitehead Street, most nw/se streets stop at Angela and the ne/sw streets stop at the Naval property on the west and Margaret Street on the east. Passover and Windsor Streets are shown, seemingly formed by a cultivated field set askew to the grid. Other cultivated fields are illustrated in block 29 and tracts 4, 5, 6, and 13. On the coast Fort Taylor, the "Old Beacon" and the military base shown in 1846 are illustrated. In the "Town Plot" area many more buildings are shown. The 1855 map generally confirms sites and streets indicated in 1850.

The 1859 fire destroyed nearly all of the structures northwest of Greene Street. All wharves and warehouses were destroyed, as were most of Key West's commercial buildings. The town, however, had already expanded southeast as far as Angela Street before 1859; thus the fire was not likely to bring about radical change in the town plan. The <sup>8</sup>warehouse and commercial buildings were rebuilt in approximately the same locations.

The 1884 Bird's Eye View of Key West illustrates the town 25 years after the fire. Streets now extend south to United and east to White and the informal tracks have disappeared. There is dense development of buildings in the downtown and several blocks south (to Division Street) of the original "Town Plot." To the east development is consistent to Frances Street. Beyond this point houses are scattered to the east and south. The Cemetery with a number of graves is shown in its present location and the Convent of Mary Immaculate stands out on the southern edge of downtown. Warehouses are shown in the wharf area and a few commercial buildings face on Front and Duval Streets. Density of construction in all blocks is marked by development of the interiors of these blocks.

The 1886 fire burned a much larger area of Key West than the 1859 fire, destroying most of the structures lying northwest of Fleming Street between Whitehead and Duval Streets. The area consumed in 1859 was again completely razed. It was again rebuilt. After 1886, a few brick structures were erected in this area, but there does not seem to have been strong pressure to abandon wood construction in the commercial section. Wood buildings in the twice destroyed area are numerous. They apparently date from the years immediately succeeding the fire.

Key West expanded rapidly in the second post-fire period. The commercial area was being rebuilt concurrent with the construction of new buildings southeast of Truman Avenue (then called Division Street) and northeast of White Street. The majority of the new structures was residential, although some cigar factories and commercial buildings were erected.<sup>10</sup>

The basic grid pattern of the town was preserved during the period from the 1886 fire to 1912; however, the new city blocks were considerably smaller than those laid out by Whitehead in 1829. Building materials other than wood, such as brick and concrete, were available for post-fire construction and the few structures executed in those alternative materials indicate an awareness on the island of stylistic trends and building techniques elsewhere. Nevertheless, wood remained the preferred building material in Key West during the period 1886-1912.<sup>11</sup>

Notable exceptions to the preference of wood as a building material in Key West dating from the late nineteenth century include the Monroe County Courthouse, the former Key West City Hall, and the Old Post Office and Customs House. Two of these buildings, the Monroe County Courthouse and the former Customs House were designed by William Kerr, architect of many of Key West's public buildings.<sup>12</sup> The Monroe County Courthouse (photo #51) is located in Jackson Square between Fleming and Southard Streets. Constructed in 1890, the Courthouse is a two-story masonry structure with a central square tower and cupola. The building is also distinguished by a two-story portico in the Tuscan order on the front or eastern facade of the building. The portico has a full entablature and classical pediment.<sup>13</sup>

The Old Key West City Hall (photo #52) at Ann and Greene Streets was designed by McDeirmott, Scott and Higgs in 1890. The building replaced an earlier wooden structure built in 1876 which was destroyed in the fire of 1886. As originally constructed, the building was a two-story masonry structure with a bell and tower. It was originally designed to serve as a market place, fire station and jail. Subsequent alterations to the building resulted in the removal of the tower and additions to the front of the building. Following acquisition of the building by the Key West Preservation Board in 1974, restoration of the building, including the removal of the front additions and reconstruction of the tower, was accomplished.<sup>14</sup>

The Old Post Office and Customs House is the third major public building in Key West dating from the nineteenth century. The building was constructed in 1886 at a cost of $107,000 following the design of William Kerr. Executed in the Richardsonian

Romanesque style, the building is a large three and one-half-story structure consisting of a central block with two wings. Although located outside of the boundaries of the Key West Historic District,<sup>15</sup> the building is individually listed in the National Register of Historic Places.

Aside from public buildings, a few cigar factories, perhaps five or six, were of masonry construction. Of these, only three, the Martinez Havana Company, the E.H. Gato factory (photo #50) and the Armas de Oro factory (photo #49) are extant. The Armas de Oro at Grinnell and Catherine Streets, was typical of many. It was three stories high, occupied approximately a thirty-five foot frontage and extended to a depth of one hundred feet.<sup>16</sup>

Some of the larger cigar entrepreneurs such as E.H. Gato and Seidenberg and Company contributed more extensively to the physical development of Key West through the construction of worker's houses immediately adjacent to their establishments. Surviving concentrations of what appear to have been workers' houses constructed by the cigar entrepreneurs are found on Olivia Street between White and Havana Streets and on Parker Street between United and Catherine Streets (photo #55).<sup>17</sup> Physically, these subdivisions are characterized by single-story detached structures of uniform size and setback (photo #6). Decorative detail is sparse to nearly totally absent. Many of these structures appear to utilize the shotgun plan.

The Spanish-American War generated a substantial economic boom in Key West. In slightly less than eighteen months, the Army and Navy spent nearly two and one quarter million dollars improving their Key West facilities. Because these expenditures generated other spending, their total effect was much greater.<sup>18</sup> The Key West Historic District reflects the wartime boom: many structures in the northeastern portion of the District (Tracts 6 and 7) date from this period or shortly after.<sup>19</sup>

Henry Flagler's celebrated Overseas Railway, which reached Key West in 1912, failed to initiate the economic boom its Key West promoters had hoped it would. The Railway's Key West terminal, located on land-fill on the city's northern shore, permitted the direct transfer of the railway's passengers into Havana-bound boats for the ninety mile voyage to Cuba, the destination of the majority of the passengers. There appears to have been little inducement for tourism in Key West at the time: As late as 1920, Key West had only eighteen hotels with a total of 628 rooms.<sup>20</sup> The tourism boom never came: new subdivisions, laid out to the east of 12th Street in anticipation of the Railway's expected impetus to building, lay vacant well into the twenties.<sup>21</sup>

The cigar-making and sponging industries declined in local importance in Key West at the turn of the century, marking the end of a sustained period of economic prosperity for the city. However, despite this economic slowdown, Key West continued to expand through the first decade of the twentieth century.

The 1912 Sanborn maps indicate that nearly all portions of Tract 7 from Georgia Street to Salt Pond Road (Eisenhower Drive) had been subdivided by that date. Tract 13 from Division Street (Truman Avenue) to Catherine Street between Grinnell and White Streets and a portion of Tract 14 from White Street to Florida Street between Virginia and United Streets had been similarly developed since the 1892 Sanborn survey.<sup>22</sup>

CONTINUATION SHEET 12 ITEM NUMBER 7 PAGE 5

Key West enjoyed a brief period of economic prosperity during World War I. Construction of a seaplane base, a submarine basin and military housing greatly stimulated the local economy. However, military activity on Key West was greatly curtailed after the Armistice. A dramatic drop in economic activity followed. New construction on the island similarly declined.

The city lost population steadily between 1919 and 1935. New construction was, therefore, unnecessary. Many houses became vacant, and there is even evidence that dozens of residences, particularly in the vicinity of the cigar factories, were demolished or moved to other locations.

The Key West Historic District includes an irregularly shaped area of the City of Key West bounded roughly on the north by the Key West Harbor and the United States Naval Air Station Annex; on the east by Eisenhower Drive; on the south by United Street and the Atlantic Ocean; and on the west by the Harry S. Truman United States Naval Air Station. The unusual configuration of the District is justified both visually and historically. The northwestern corner of the District borders the Key West Harbor between Whitehead and Simonton Streets to include what is known as Mallory Square. Contemporary commercial and industrial development along the harbor form an effective visual boundary for the District on the north. An undeveloped area called Peary Court, former military property, delineates the northeastern corner of the District. Contemporary development along the east side of Eisenhower Drive (photo #40) and to the south of United Street forms a distinct visual boundary for the District along these streets. The District extends to the southeast along White Street to Von Phister Street to include a concentration of contributing structures (photo #25). Contemporary development to the south of South Street and along William Street is excluded. The Casa Marina Hotel (photo #34) is included in the District by a one block-wide corridor of contributing structures between Vernon and Alberta Streets south of United Street. The District follows the historic Tract Line of Tracts 11 and 12 north to Amelia Street to exclude contemporary tourist-related development along Simonton Street. The Convent of Mary Immaculate, now the site of contemporary development, is excluded from the District. The District extends to the Atlantic Ocean between Duval and Whitehead Streets south of United Street to include a concentration of large Queen Anne structures along South and Duval Streets. The western boundaries of the District are defined by an area of contemporary development along Emma Street and by the Harry S. Truman Naval Air Station bordering Whitehead Street.

Like many seaport towns, Key West is oriented to the water. Access to the harbor being important to various businesses and industries, many of them were located immediately adjacent to the wharves. The 1884 Bird's Eye View shows many warehouses, chandleries and general merchandise stores in the vicinity of the docks along Wall, Front, Greene, Simonton and Duval Streets. Cigar factories, a bottling plant and bakeries were acattered further inland. As Key West grew in the late nineteenth century commercial development extended along Duval Street. In addition, individual (and frequently located on a corner) commercial buildings sprang up throughout the town. Many of these commercial buildings appear to have been residential on the upper stories (see discussion of commercial building types below). Truman Street, now largely commercial, has become the artery to U.S. 1 and the mainland. Commercial development here post dates the development of the Overseas Highway in the late 1930s and is inconsistent with the character of the historic district.

Unlike other historic Florida towns, the courthouse square of Key West, known as Jackson Square, has never been the focus of significant commercial development, nor has it been the axis of a formal town plan. The same statement can be made for other buildings which might have logically served as a focus: the City Hall, U.S. Post Office and U.S. Customs Office. Only the latter bears any relation to a public area, in this case Clinton Place, but there was apparently no attempt at formality: Clinton Place is merely the awkward intersection of three streets.

Other public buildings in the District, notably schools and churches, are also scattered, although several churches are clustered on Eaton Street. Public lodging in the Historic District consists of guest house conversions of large residences, contemporary motels and two large hotels, the La Concha built in 1926 and located at the corner of Duval and Fleming Streets and the Casa Marina built by the Flagler Railroad between 1912 and 1920 and facing on the Atlantic.

The majority of the area of the Historic District consists, however, of residential neighborhoods sprinkled with a few commercial buildings. Buildings in these areas appear to have been constructed without any particular regard for their relationships to each other. This may stem in part from the fact that the original streets, before they were paved, were merely irregular tracks. Many small alleys and pathways still enter the older lots at irregular intervals, and these are marked by a variety of houses oriented indifferently to each other. It is this casual approach to setbacks, sidewalks, curbs and siting that provides much of the character of the historic district. Due to the density of this development, many buildings have no discernible front or side yards and the usual greensward seen in North Florida historic districts dating from the 19th century is almost totally absent in Key West. Fences are apparently used to define property lines in confined areas, rather than to enclose lawns or pets. Of the fences which remain, wrought iron, masonry and wood pickets are the usual materials (see photos). As a result of the small yard associated with most structures there are few dependencies. A formerly common dependency, the rainwater cistern, can still be seen occasionally in the Historic District (photo #46). The major green spaces in the district are Jackson Square, the City Cemetery (photo #37 and 38), the Casa Marina grounds (photo #34), and Bayview Park (photo #39).

Most of the buildings in the Historic District are of wood construction and are residential. There is seldom a clear-cut distinction between commercial and residential building types among structures in Key West which appear to predate 1900. Certain building types served either function equally well. Some structures have been converted from one use to another, especially in the area northwest of Greene Street and along Duval Street and Truman Avenue. The overwhelming majority of buildings are Classical Revival variations. Frame vernacular structures constitute the second largest category with shotgun houses providing the greatest number of examples.

There are a few Queen Anne houses and Gothic Revival cottages in the district although the stylistic features of these were not well developed. The buildings included in the district were for the most part, constructed during the nineteenth century. The few built in the twentieth century were either Colonial Revival or bungalows. Classical Revival buildings comprise the greatest number of structures in the historic district. Basically, Classical Revival architecture is an outgrowth of the Greek Revival style which appeared in America in the 1820s. In many places, Greek Revival reached its zenith during the 1840s, but classical influences remained strong in some regions, particularly the South, for decades afterward.

The Greek Revival style is an adaptation of ancient Greek and Roman architecture, particularly the classic Greek temple. No region of the United States laid exclusive claim to the Greek Revival. It was popular in the South, as in other regions. However, the term "Classical Revival" is more apt than Greek Revival when referring to the products of most American builders. Greek Revival is a more restrictive term because it is usually applied to the architecture designed between 1820-1850 by America's first generation of professional architects. The many anonymous classically inspired structures constructed during and after this period are therefore termed Classical Revival.

The temple form house (photo #24, 44, 57, 64) is ideally a simple rectangular block of one or more stories. It has a low pitched roof; the main entrance is in the gable end. The attic story extends forward beyond the vertical plane of the principal stories, forming the pediment of a portico. Formal columns (Doric, Ionic, Corinthian, Tuscan) are an integral part of the portico structure.

Square pillars are often substituted for columns and a few simple moldings replace Classical capitals. A plain frieze and a boxed cornice with a few molding strips form a partial entablature. Typically there is no architrave.

It is not known when the first Classical Revival buildings were constructed in Key West. Some buildings in Whitehead's 1839 drawings seem to be temple-form. Most have a porch on the entrance facade. These drawings, and the subsequent views made in 1855 and 1884, are too indistinct to allow more than general speculation about building styles. Most of the built environment represented seems to be classically inspired frame vernacular.

Existing Classical Revival house types in the Key West Historic District are separated into two basic classes: temple-form, those whose main roof line is perpendicular to the street (photo #24) and others, whose roof line is parallel to the street (photo #59). Most houses in both classes consist of a simple rectangular block with a rear kitchen ell.

The main roof of either type is pitched and has a continuous ridge connecting with gable ends (photo #57). The roof of the ell may be either parallel or perpendicular to the main roof ridge. There are some Classical Revival houses with hipped roofs. The majority of these houses are of two stories with a potentially habitable attic space. All Classical Revival houses are built of wood.

Sixteen one-and-one-half story houses in the district with the main roof parallel to the street had "saw-tooth" additions: the additions had one or more ridges parallel to the main roof. This usually indicated that the house has been enlarged by stages over a period of time. This technique is not unique to Key West, but no other Florida communities are known to have an equal number.

Classical Revival houses in Key West exhibit two basic floor plans, the central hall and the side hall. These plans are common to most other house types, except shotguns, in Key West. Foundations for Classical Revival houses are similar to those used for most wooden construction throughout Key West. The sill of the frame is supported by foundation piers located at the corners of the building and at the intersections of the sill members. The most common pier is a monolithic limestone block, however other materials are also used, sometimes in combination. These include brick, concrete and wood. Limestone for the piers was quarried, as surface rubble is too soft and porous to support any great weight. Limestone is the only native stone on Key West and the surrounding Keys.

Foundation walls, except for those that have been added recently, are practically unknown in Key West Classical Revival buildings. The areas between piers were traditionally screened by wood lattice or pickets. The piers rest on the ground surface. They have not been sunk into the ground for stability as the island is itself limestone, and there is little topsoil.

Less than one percent of the wooden buildings on Key West possess chimneys and there appear to be no examples of Classical Revival buildings with chimneys. There are no extended periods of cold weather in Key West, and fireplaces or other heating devices requiring chimneys are not necessary. The few chimneys and flues that have been recorded are all of brick and most are found in buildings of other styles and materials.

The exterior sheathing used for most wood frame buildings in Key West is weatherboard. Board and batten siding is found on some small Classical Revival cottages, but it is seldom seen on their street facades. Many Classical Revival houses have flush siding under the porch roof on the street facade and weatherboard or board and batten on the other elevations. Flush siding may be set either vertically or horizontally.

The most common window type in Key West is the double hung wood sash with six lights in each sash. Houses of every style feature this window type. Some buildings have windows with one or two lights in one or both sashes, but these are not numerous. A very few buildings feature leaded or latticed windows or the other novel types found in the more elaborate nineteenth century houses throughout the United States.

Windows on any full story generally measure 6' x 3'6", and in a half-story or gable they are usually 4' x 2'6"; however these dimensions are by no means universal. Not all buildings have windows in the gable, some have only a fixed wooden blind for ventilation. This is particularly the case with houses which have a gable facing the street. The windows of houses of nearly every type have been fitted with blinds, either side or top hinged. Shutters are rare. The blinds usually have movable louvers. Where French doors are present they also are likely to have blinds.

About fifty houses on Key West have a type of window arrangement not known to exist elsewhere in Florida. These have windows on the half-story or attic of the street facade: the facade wall does not stop at the roof plate but continues past the tie beams of the trusses to the rafters. They are not dormer windows since they do not project. Instead, they are located beneath the shelter of the porch roof. While such windows do not allow a view, they admit indirect light. The proportions of these windows are the same as those found in the gables.

The street facades of Key West temple form houses often have pediments rather than simple gables. This is generally the case if the porch is incised rather than attached. The pediments may have either open or closed beds and usually have either a window or blind in the tympanum. The rear of the temple form house normally does not have a pediment. Classical Revival houses with roof ridge parallel to the street generally have unadorned gable ends; windows or blinds are generally present.

Not many houses have dormers or other prominent features on the roof. Roof hatches, called scuttles, can be seen on a minority of houses throughout the areas of concentration. A few houses have small balustraded roof platforms. Strangely, these "widow's walks" appear on houses with gabled as well as hipped roofs.

The roofs of all types of buildings in Key West were once covered with wood shingles. Many houses today have shingles made of galvanized steel, and usually have some pattern embossed in the metal. Still other houses have crimped seam sheets of galvanized steel as a roofing material. Asphalt and other types of roofing occur infrequently. The preference for metal roofing arises from considerations of fire resistance and thermal efficiency, for which reason the metal is coated with aluminum paint.

Porches, verandahs, and galleries are so common in Key West as to be a consistent feature of the built environment. Porches or other "living spaces" outside the main block of the house may signify an adaptation or concession to the island's climate. The same may be hypothesized about placement of windows and especially French doors. The heat of Key West summers makes adequate ventilation a necessity; porches and the like may constitute extensions of this desire for well-ventilated spaces.

The porch is sometimes roofed separately from the main structure, but some porches are formed by incision into the main block of the house, or by extending the roof on the gable end. Incised porches are found on houses with ridges parallel to the street and the tie beams of the trusses extend seven to eight feet beyond the exterior wall of the street facade. The tie beams and the rafters therefore form the porch. The porch pillars carry the ends of the roof trusses, four for a three-bay building or six for a five-bay building. Pillars on buildings of this type bear part of the load of the main roof. The porch may have a ceiling but does not in every case.

The porches of most Classical Revival buildings have square columns or pillars. They generally approximate the simplest of the classical orders, Tuscan, but are not of true order. The shaft is a square timber, in some cases chamfered. Simple wood moldings give the pillar its "classical" appearance.

The pillars seldom have a base but sit directly on the deck. They are thin relative to their height; their widths generally do not vary from one to two-story buildings. Most two-story buildings have a porch and a gallery. The pillars which support both the gallery deck and the porch or house roof are generally unbroken shafts which are cued into the gallery with wooden pegs. This is not always the case, but where there are superimposed pillars only those of the upper story have capitals.

The use of classicizing details is generally limited to the street facade. A considerable number of Classical Revival buildings have turned porch posts. Their turning profiles vary, but the upper twelve and lower thirty-six inches are usually squared or chamfered.

The majority of porches have balustrades and a variety of other millwork. The latter, for the most part, is not classically inspired but instead identifies Key West as a beneficiary of the industrial revolution. The late nineteenth century witnessed the application of mass production techniques to wooden architectural details. Particularly easy and inexpensive to make were vine, floral, and interlace pattern brackets and drops cut from flat boards. Balusters were mass produced in the same manner. The type having the silhouette of an urn was popular, and many variations of this type are found in Key West. Spindle balusters, products of an improved lathe, are also present. Bead and spindle millwork is found on some classically inspired buildings but is not limited to houses of this type.

The bargeboard is still another example of mass-produced millwork found on some Key West houses. It is usually triangular in outline and connects the roof ridge with the lower corners of the roof. It has no actual structural function but is protective and decorative. The bargeboard may be composed of a single unit which has had decorative patterns sawn into it or may consist of a number of separate members which have been fitted together.

Frame vernacular houses constitute the largest category of residential buildings after the Classical Revival (photo #8, 9, 58, 61). They are plain structures having, few, if any, discernible decorative details. Some of the houses are virtually identical to Classical Revival examples except that they lack stylistic features, e.g. pillars with capitals, pediments, entablatures, incised porches.

The majority of the frame vernacular houses are one-and-a-half story buildings. They are rectangular in exterior plan, and their roof ridges are perpendicular to the street. This combination of elements lends them the superficial appearance of Classical Revival temple form houses. Every such example has an attached porch, the roof of which usually divides the main block of the house between the ground story and the attic.

The house normally has a side hall ground plan expressed in three bays. This side hall plan is identical with many Classical Revival houses and occasionally causes confusion between the two types. The attic is certainly habitable in some cases, but it is difficult to identify these, since many frame vernacular houses have an attic window with blinds in the gable facing the street.

Some side hall houses have an exterior T-plan. These generally have a verandah on three sides. In at least a few cases houses with such an arrangement have doors connecting the cap of the "T" with the verandah.

As with Classical Revival central hall houses these frame vernacular structures are roughly rectangular in plan and have verandahs. Some two-story examples are irregular in plan, with ell or additions connected in what appears to be random fashion to the main block of the house.

There is nothing to distinguish frame vernacular houses constructed in Key West between 1886 and 1912 from contemporary examples of Classical Revival in regard to general use of materials and construction techniques. Foundations, methods of construction, sheathing and roofing are all identical.

Vernacular houses are found throughout the historic district but are found in particular concentration in the area defined by White and Angela Streets, Eisenhower Drive and Truman Avenue. Another area is that defined by Margaret, United, and White Streets, and Truman Avenue.

Shotgun houses constitute the most prominent category within the class of frame vernacular (photo #6, 7, 10, 17, 55). The "shotgun" is a rectangular one-story structure whose roof ridge is perpendicular to the street. Shotguns were as simple and inexpensive as they were small - many are twelve by thirty feet in floor area - and many could be constructed in a small land area.

In Key West, many shotguns were constructed as company houses. They were usually located within easy walking distance of the factories. Although the factories have been demolished, the shotgun houses remain. The 1912 Sanborn map shows many small frame dwellings, probably shotguns, in the immediate vicinity of the cigar factories. Particular concentrations of shotgun houses were found on Olivia, Watson, Varela and Packer Streets, and Havana and Pohalski Avenues. Most blocks in tracts 13 and 14 contain some shotgun houses. These are, however, mixed with other building types. Many other structures which may originally have been shotgun houses were too altered to determine their original forms. Alteration included not only changing the ground plan but in some cases increasing the height of the building to include a half or full second story.

The basic plan of the shotgun house consists of three rooms, one behind the other, whose front and rear doors are in alignment with the doors connecting the rooms. Most of the extant buildings date between 1889 and 1899. These dates conform with the construction of shotgun houses elsewhere in the South.

Wood frame shotguns were built using techniques common to wood frame construction throughout Key West. Some examples have concrete block foundations, but this is infrequent, found only where the building has been considerably altered.

None of the shotgun houses recorded has a chimney, nor is there evidence that any were ever provided with one. A chimney is costly, and while the companies who built Key West shotgun houses were willing to provide shelter for their workers, they were not likely to exceed community building standards. The houses show evidence of hasty construction: they were not finished to the standards evident in nearby Classical Revival houses. Many shotguns have board and batten siding, but there has been considerable replacement of sheathing. Existing structures are clad in a variety of materials, asbestos shingles in particular.

Some Key West shotguns have three-bay facades, lending them the external appearance of a three-bay side hall house. The house is not wide enough to accommodate that floor plan. The probable advantage of the extra window is increased ventilation. Each side elevation usually has three windows, one in each of the three rooms. The rear is like the front. Most windows are fitted with blinds. There is often a window or wood blind in the gable facing the street.

The predominant roofing material of shotguns like that found on other frame buildings in Key West is metal. Raised seam galvanized steel sheet occurs more frequently than metal shingles, which are more expensive. Roof features are generally absent; however, some shotguns have been fitted with roof scuttles to increase air circulation.

Shotgun houses which have not been altered have a porch on the street facade. The porch may be either incised or attached, but it usually has a post at each corner. These rest on the porch deck. A few houses have been fitted with porches resembling those of bungalows. Some porches have been entirely enclosed. Decorative details on unaltered shotgun houses are few. Some have turned posts and scroll sawed brackets, but none exhibit any extensive stylistic program.

Queen Anne style houses are, after Classical Revival, the only formal type represented by sufficient numbers in Key West to warrant detailed discussion (photo #1, 4, 19, 45, 60). Few other architectural styles are represented in the district. The Queen Anne style which was popular between 1876 and 1910, is characterized by a deliberate complexity of plan and ornament. Ideally, each facade is different in height and appearance and may display a multitude of shapes, colors, and textures. Variety in plan is expressed in turrets and attached towers, bay and oriel windows. Other distinctive features are porches, verandahs, overhangs and balconies.

In a pattern book example of Queen Anne, each story is sheathed in a different manner. The lower story may be of rusticated stone trimmed with brick; the second story, weatherboard and shingle. The gables may be half-timbered, giving the illusion of exposed structural members, and the intervening spaces filled with a smooth-surfaced material. There is a large variety of exterior decorative trim. Queen Anne "spindlework" was turned or carved, unlike the decorative trim of many Classical Revival structures, which was sawn.

Most of the houses classified as Queen Anne have no other major stylistic characteristics than the ubiquitous tower. A few houses are clearly Classical Revival structures to which a tower has been appended. Although faceted bays have been identified with the Queen Anne style, this feature achieved such popularity on the island that it may appear on structures of any style.

Perhaps the best example of a Queen Anne house in Key West is at 1400 Duval Street locally called the "Southernmost" house (photo #1). This brick house features the irregular plan, diverse use of materials, and decorative variety of the Queen Anne style. It is, however, more balanced and formal than "ideal" Queen Anne houses found elsewhere in the United States. This may be due in part to its late date of construction, 1899. By that time the Queen Anne style had begun to give way to a new wave of "classical" influence expressed in newer styles. The most telling details are paired Tuscan columns, which stand on paneled pedestals, and the urn balusters and entablatures above the porch and gallery. The tower, with its Tudor arch windows, and the pointed arch window in one of the gables facing the street are among the more traditional medieval or picturesque features normal in a Queen Anne house.

Most Queen Anne houses in Key West have brick foundation piers with a lattice infill; however, some share the common characteristic of Key West frame houses in their use of limestone block foundations. Other building types also have lattice between their piers. It is doubtful, therefore, that its existence can be regarded as a distinguishing characteristic of the Queen Anne house. Exclusive use of the brick pier, however, seems limited to Queen Anne houses on the island.

Very few Queen Anne houses have masonry wall foundations. Among these are the Southernmost house and three cast stone houses located at 401, 405, and 407

South Street. The latter stand in the block opposite the Southernmost house.

Chimneys played a prominent role in the design of Queen Anne houses throughout the United States. Queen Anne houses, like the majority of structures in Key West, generally lack chimneys. However, five of the Queen Anne houses in the district have brick chimneys. Each is located on the rear slope of the main roof near the center of the building.

All but five of these houses in the district were of wood frame construction; two were brick and three, those on South Street, were cast stone. The combinations of the building materials so evident in the Queen Anne style construction elsewhere are entirely absent in Key West.

The wood frame houses were all sheathed in weatherboard or weatherboard and shingle. The variations in texture within the same story common in Queen Anne style construction elsewhere, are confined to variations in the same material in Key West. Shingling and other textural motifs which offer contrast to the sheathing of the main block are confined mainly in the gables and trim areas.

The main blocks of the majority of the Queen Anne houses in Key West have three bays. Most surveyed structures have six over six light double-hung sash windows, but some have windows with two over one over one lights. Doors have generally been fitted with sidelights and transoms. Fewer than half of the Queen Anne houses have dormers. Dormer types vary from house to house, but the simple gable seems to predominate.

Porches, galleries, and verandahs play the same important role in Queen Anne houses as in other styles in Key West. Unusual, however, are the houses on South Street which have one-story porches with a balustraded deck above. This feature is probably the result of influence by the newer Colonial Revival and is not typical of Queen Anne.

There is one type of wood frame commercial building in Key West, once quite common in American cities during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, which has now entirely disappeared from many communities. No formal stylistic category describes it sufficiently. It is called variously carpenter storefront, false front or boom town.

The principal feature of this type of building is its high street facade, topped by a coping or bracketed cornice. This facade presents the illusion that the main block of the structure is more substantial than is actually the case. Most of the examples in Key West have stepped facades. Eleven are found on Duval Street. These have either two or three steps, each of which supports a heavy cornice. The central step on some of these buildings is either pointed or arched. The false fronts of these buildings mask pitched roofs. Although the cornices on the steps of the facade may appear classical there is nothing classical about the steps themselves.

Examination of old photographs in the Monroe County Public Library indicates that this type of building was once fairly common in Key West, but it is impossible to estimate the number that were constructed on the island. Stepped facade buildings are also found on Caroline, William, Frances, and Whitehead Streets.

Other types of wood frame commercial buildings are also found in the Key West Historic District. One configuration is the same form and has many of the same features as the Classical Revival, 3 bay temple form house. The major distinction between the two is that the first story porch of the commercial building has been infilled. Each side bay is a large display window with platform while the central bay contains the doorway and transom sash. The second story is used as living quarters and is usually reached by an exterior stair located on a side elevation.

Another nonresidential building type is the two story wood frame commercial building sited on a street corner. This building usually has two elevations located immediately on the sidewalk or raised the height of one or two steps. Doorways and windows on the first story may have protective shutters or there may be display windows. The second story is usually residential and both stories may be protected from the sun by a second story covered gallery supported from below by angle braces. The gallery where it exists has turned posts and balustrade and may be further decorated by brackets and other ornamental woodwork.

A final wood frame commercial building is the small one story structure similar to that shown in Photo #58. This simple shop design is scattered throughout the district.

There are also a few brick warehouses in the district (Photo #54). These are sited immediately adjacent to the street in the area near the wharves. The warehouses are monumental one story buildings and the one large interior space was used purely for storage (no residential quarters). On the exterior the openings of the building are protected by large paired iron shutters. These arched head doorways occur at regular intervals on the side elevations of the building and are centrally placed in the gable ends. Above the doorway in the gable was an arched head window, in the example shown this has been infilled with masonry. All elevations of the building have a corbelled brick cornice.

Alterations to the building stock described above (and particularly to the wood frame buildings described) has taken a variety of forms, however these alterations can be broadly classified under the following categories: (1) to provide more or better arranged space, (2) to provide for better adaptation to the climate (3) to replace damaged parts (4) to provide security (5) to exhibit a more fashionable appearance. It is important to note that more than one motive could be satisfied by some of the alterations.

Since Key West has not been until recently an affluent community, the limitations of the economic condition of the city probably played a role in the approach to alterations. Many of the solutions described below were necessary and relatively inexpensive. Even some of the solutions associated with cosmetic appearance could be achieved when damaged parts were replaced. Generally a simple and inexpensive approach was taken.

One of the easiest ways to arrange more space was to enclose the porch. This opportunity was available to most renovators since most Key West houses had porches. Another common solution to achieve more space was to add to the rear of the building. A third technique was to rearrange or add or subtract windows and doors to provide for better use of existing space. Associated with this technique was the subdivision of buildings into apartments (a frequent happening during the housing shortage of World War II) or the reuse of a dwelling as a commercial structure. The former usually required the addition of an exterior stair to the second story accommodations.

Better thermal control was frequently the thought behind replacing original window sash and doors with jalousie or awning (either glass or metal) units. Other means of heat control were aluminum awnings and painting metal roofs with reflective paints.

When damaged (usually rotten) building materials were replaced, new substitute materials were often chosen. Sometimes the new materials were touted as cheaper, longer lasting, requiring less maintenance or more fashionable and better looking. Later evidence has not borne out some of the claims. Frequently replaced building parts included porch decks, pillars, balustrades and steps, wood siding, doors and windows. Replacements were often of the same materials, but more current design; sometimes new materials - vinyl, asbestos and aluminum siding, wrought iron or masonry porch pillars, masonry porch decks and steps were chosen. Modifications to provide increased safety included burglar bars and infill of foundation openings between piers with masonry walls.

Fashion was served most directly by colorful paint choices or "colonialized" or overly decorative details: inappropriate blinds, brackets, pediments, balustrades and fences. Another approach was to take contemporary stylistic features - from bungalows in the 1920s and 30s and from "modern" buildings of the 1950s - and apply them to earlier building stock.

It is the personalized solution to many common problems grafted onto a homogeneous building stock which has provided Key West with both consistency of overall design and its panoply of decorative elements.

A surprising number of structures dating from the period 1886-1912 exist in one contiguous area of Key West. Sanborn map sheets depicting the area indicate that a continuous renewal of the building stock on the western portion of the island took place in 1912, in spite of the availability of undeveloped land elsewhere within the city limits. Some vacant areas remained within the western area, but by 1892, six years after the fire, they were not large.

Although structural density within the area became somewhat more pronounced, building habits scarcely changed. Residential and commercial buildings continued, for the most part, to be constructed in wood. The 1892 Sanborn maps indicate only twenty-four masonry civilian structures on the island. Of these, three were houses, two were cigar factories, and the remainder were commercial and public buildings or churches.

The conservatism inherent in local building practices is evident by the absence of any "high style" structures prior to 1900. Further, in Key West, the better surviving examples of the major formal styles, Classical Revival and Queen Anne, are not equal to better examples in the same styles located farther to the north or in the Middle West. Key West's architecture as it is represented by surviving structures can only be described as provincial. It would seem that residential construction in Key West was more the province of the contractor or carpenter than the architect, designer, or client. So little individuality displayed in the hundreds of examples of a generalized architectural style suggests either rudimentary prefabrication or a limited number of house carpenters resident on the island.

The factories which once stood in the midst of the residential areas have virtually disappeared. Only four of the larger factory buildings which were standing in 1912 still remain. About ten other structures, small buildings which are indistinguishable from other residences, which are identified on Sanborn maps as factories, exist today.

The building stock of Key West stands as an essay in conservative construction, but this conservatism in no way detracts from the distinction of that built environment. While there are few high style buildings and while those few high style examples suffer in comparison with high style examples found elsewhere, that does not affect the total affect of the timelessness engendered by the mass of wooden structures which make up the building stock of the island.

Building Classification:

Conforming: Buildings or structures which generally date from the nineteenth or early twentieth century and which clearly exhibit the architectural styles associated with Key West during the identified period of significance. Alterations to these buildings appear minimal.
(Red)

Altered: Buildings or structures generally eligible for category one except that major exterior alterations have significantly altered the character and details of the original design.
(Yellow)

Non-Conforming: Buildings or structures which generally post-date World War II and do not respect the scale, set-back or materials used in the buildings constructed during the period of significance.
(Blue)

Green Spaces: Large expanses of open areas associated with recreational functions such as parts or similar public areas.

Vacant Spaces: Generally these are lots associated with individual structures which form yards or otherwise green spaces. Paved lots are indicated by a pattern of cross hatching; unpaved lots by a single hatch pattern.

The Key West Historic District possesses historical and architectural significance as the physical manifestation of the 160 year existence of one of Florida's most important cities. The district contains possibly the greatest and most important concentration of wooden structures in Florida.

The City of Key West was founded almost simultaneously with Spain's formal transfer of the Floridas to the United States of America during the first quarter of the nineteenth century; and for much of that century Key West remained one of the largest, most prosperous, and famous of the territory's - then the state's - cities. Thus, Key West is historically significant as an urban center in a state with few such centers of population. Key West is also significant in that its built environment has undergone few apparent changes, despite its partial destruction by fire, and by storm. The city represents an extreme example of conservative local building practice in a period of considerable change in such practices throughout the state and the nation. Therefore, although Key West cannot be said to be structurally the same town that was founded in the 1820s, it represents its inhabitants' ideas of what that town was and how it appeared.

Key West has served many functions during its past; as the early American settlement in extreme southern Florida it provides a good example of entrepreneurial and speculative adaptation to trying circumstances. As a seaport city, Key West represents a microcosm of how Floridians lived in the nineteenth century before the development of adequate inland transportation systems. It provides an excellent framework for discussions of peculiar but extremely important Florida industries like sponging, the live fish trade, wrecking, salt making, and cigar manufacturing. Key West has played an important role as a center of 19th century industry and a magnet for Cuban and West Indian immigration. And it has long functioned as a center for local, state, and federal government operations and as an example of the effects of military activity in cities in the nineteenth as well as the twentieth century.

The existence of the City of Key West is testimony to the aspirations and abilities of the entrepreneurs of Florida's American Territorial Period (1821-1845). Little, if any, physical evidence of extensive prior habitation of the Island has come to light, and because Key West is densely settled such evidence may have been obscured or entirely obliterated more than a century ago. The island now called Key West was probably "discovered" by Ponce de Leon during his explorations of 1513; however, no contact with aboriginal Floridians was noted.<sup>1</sup> William Whitehead recalled that bones had been found at several island sites in 1826-27, and that in 1824-25 an Indian mound had been discovered and pieces of gold and bones had been found in it.<sup>2</sup> A large midden mound, "ten or twelve feet high, and of considerable circumference," had been opened in 1833, "but nothing was found save stones and shells."<sup>3</sup> Local attempts to ascertain the extent of aboriginal occupation or use of Key West thus went for naught, and mentions of finds of aboriginal artifacts or evidences of habitation ceased about the time of the Civil War. Known settlement on the Island of Key West, therefore, is a product of Euroamerican expansion in the years after 1500.

Permanent settlement of the Island is entirely a product of the American Territorial period. While it is likely that Juan Ponce sighted or even touched Key West, and it is almost certain that the island was known to the colonial officials and Franciscan brothers who managed the mission system within Florida, and it is known that wreckers and fishermen from the West Indies touched the island and may have used it as a temporary base, no permanent settlement was planted at Key West until 1822, when John Simonton arrived.

Simonton claimed the island by right of purchase from a Spanish grantee, Juan P. Salas, who had been granted the island called Cayo Hueso in 1815.<sup>5</sup> Salas apparently still owned his island when the United States acquired the Floridas from Spain in the Adams-Onis Treaty (1819, ratified 1821). In January 1822, however, a New Yorker named John W. Simonton purchased Cayo Hueso for $2000.<sup>6</sup> Simonton, who had shipping interests in Havana, Mobile, and New Orleans, came into possession of an unsettled island: no record of any improvements made by Salas exists. Although the Simonton claim to ownership of the Island was contested and remained legally in doubt until 1828, the history of settlement on the westernmost of the Florida Keys began on January 19, 1822, when Simonton purchased Salas' grant.

Simonton acted to realize some return from his investment by selling quarters of the island. One quarter was sold to John Warner and John Mountain, who sold it to Pardon C. Greene. The second and third quarters were sold to John C. Fleming (later spelled Fleming) and John Whitehead, both residents of Mobile.<sup>8</sup> The history of the built environment of Key West may be said to date from March, 1822, when both Whitehead and Fleming came to visit their investment.

Whitehead and Fleming arrived at Key West aboard a Navy vessel commanded by Lieutenant Commander Matthew C. Perry. Perry had been ordered to Key West to take possession and survey it as a potential navy depot. Perry's report, together with the more detailed survey of Captian Daniel Patterson, conducted in 1822-23, provided the first extensive description of the island, which Perry renamed Thompson's, to honor Secretary of the Navy Smith Thompson. Whitehead and Fleming landed with Perry in early 1822, and they brought workmen and lumber sufficient to construct a house. This they apparently did, although no record of the appearance of the structure survives.

The cooperation of the Navy with Key West's early entrepreneurs was notable; however, considerable tension between the civilian owners of the island and their Navy guests arose on various occasions, the earliest of which was during the period that the West Indian Anti-Piracy Squadron made its home at Key West. This flotilla, commanded by Commodore David Porter, had been organized to make the Caribbean safe for civilian commerce. Key West was one logical location for the Squadron base, and while it was based there, Commodore Porter made life extremely lively for the entrepreneurs. Porter had storehouses, barracks, officers' quarters, a hospital, and other structures built, which established the military presence on the island, but he also refused to recognize civilian jurisdiction over any portion of Key West.<sup>10</sup> In spite of him, the town grew.

While establishment of the navy base did not yield the results that the entrepreneurs might have desired, they persevered. They laid out a town plan, built their own warehouse, imported sheep and hogs, and cut wood to sell to Navy personnel. They also prepared to make salt in the local tidal pools. The town of Key West began to grow: A United States Customs House, established in 1822, aided commerce and wrecking activities. The town of Key West was incorporated in 1828, and it served as the seat of government of Monroe County. The town also benefitted from the residence of the newly created federal court.<sup>12</sup> These events confirmed the importance of the settlement and spurred further development.

The town of Key West developed in the harbor area, along Front Street between Whitehead and Simonton, during the 1820s and 30s. William Adee Whitehead, brother of one entrepreneur, surveyed the site and mapped it in February 1829.<sup>13</sup> This original town plot consisted of sixty-four lots and two public squares. It occupied a total of 258 acres, roughly on the northeastern end of the island. Whitehead indicated two existing wharves. By 1832, there were five hundred inhabitants and eighty-one buildings in town. Most of these structures were located close to the waterfront, and that area remained a very desirable location for residences, as well as commercial structures, until 1903, when expansion by the Navy forced civilians farther inland.<sup>14</sup> By 1838, there were "eighty dwelling houses, . . . eight or ten groceries, three provision and grocery stores, . . . three large warehouses."<sup>15</sup> Although there is no doubt that the town of Key West had become permanent and had begun to grow by the time Whitehead drew his map, there is also little doubt that the map reflects entrepreneurial aspirations as well as reality. Although "streets" extend southeast beyond Caroline, none of them had been cleared by 1836, and a shallow tidal pool covered about two acres of supposedly dry land near the harbor. However, the hurricane of 1846 changed the configuration of the island and closed the pond to the sea.<sup>16</sup>

Whitehead made two drawings of Key West in 1838, and these provide the first reliable evidence about the appearance of the settlement's built environment.<sup>17</sup> In the view looking north are a number of one and two-story buildings lining Front Street near the harbor. Off to the northeast, in the area now known as Peary Court, is an Army cantonment. The second drawing, looking southeast, indicates additional structures along Front Street, the tidal pool, and nearby houses. Whitehead Street is depicted as extending to the opposite end of the island. The sketches' legends list the customs house, the courthouse, the jail, the cemetery, and a lighthouse on Whitehead's Point as existing at the time. More important, Whitehead's drawings establish the appearance of the town of Key West and offer some evidence about the extent to which growth had conformed to the 1829 map. After almost a decade, Key West remained a small settlement, occupying little more than a toehold on the island. Most of the land seems to have remained in woods and scrub. Only two principal streets, Whitehead and Front, can be discerned. The pattern of settlement, the placement of structures in relation to the streets and to each other, appears to have been haphazard.

The drawings are striking for their representations of contemporary buildings. These appear similar in many respects to a number of structures found within the Key West Historic District today. Nothing definite can be said about the "styles" of these 1838 structures; however, there seem to be frame buildings whose chief distinction is the incised porch. Little can be inferred about the individual buildings' function except those labelled as warehouses, and they seem comparatively larger than the other structures. Construction seems to have been primarily of wood.<sup>18</sup> Whether any structure depicted by Whitehead exists today is a matter for speculation. Most, if not all, have fallen victim to the ravages of age, fire, and hurricane.

Key West had few amenities in the 1830s: there were no schools and no churches. The local economy depended heavily upon the seasonal industries of fishing and wrecking, and there was little inducement to reside year 'round. By 1830, the population had reached 517: 368 whites, 83 free blacks, and 66 slaves. Most islander were native born Americans. Most were employed in wrecking and fishing. Slaves were used extensively in performing the more arduous and dangerous tasks.<sup>19</sup>

The local economy, so influential in the growth of pioneer settlements into their mature forms, was peculiar in Florida to Key West. The founding entrepreneurs envisioned a self-sufficient community surrounding and drawing sustenance from its port, and their creation was intended to be as independent an economic entity as its island situation would allow. Early residents built their lives and expectations around the sea in classic terms: seafaring, including fishing and rendering aid to distressed mariners and their vessels, supported their community in the Antebellum period. This economy was in the process of broadening through increasing participation in the regional trades in live fish and salt, and by development of a specialized sponge industry. Although the Key West economy cannot be said to have been crippled by the War in the fashion of Atlanta or Charleston, it suffered serious dislocation as a result of that conflict, and adjustments to postwar events will comprise another section of this narrative.

Other maritime industries were important to Key West, but wrecking, or salvage activity, was the dominant economic force during the first half of the nineteenth century. American wreckers emigrated to Key West from other places with nautical traditions, especially from the ports of the New England and Middle Atlantic States. Wreckers from northern ports cruised the Florida Reef in search of salvage as early as 1822.<sup>20</sup> Wreckers flying the flags of other nations were also active. One hundred and twenty vessels from the Bahamas were employed in wrecking in 1823, and many if not most of them operated near the Florida Reef.<sup>21</sup> The Bahamians, however, faced strong competition from New Englanders, fishermen who came to troll the waters and to salvage shipwrecks on the Reef.<sup>22</sup> By 1826, traffic along the Reef had increased markedly: 167 American flag vessels alone called at Key West.<sup>23</sup> Aids to navigation were not much improved from Spanish times, however, and as the number of ships traversing the area increased, so also did the number which came to grief. Key West served as a base for the wreckers, whose name implied base motives but whose actions belied them. The city came in large part to depend upon the wreckers' activities:

You will naturally enquire how we live, and the reply is very simply, in, by and through wrecks. If we are not directly interested in the business our support wholly comes from it. Stop that and we cease to live.<sup>24</sup>

Between 1848 and 1859, 618 vessels were at least partially salvaged from the Florida Reef. They carried cargoes valued at approximately $22,000,000. Salvors collected $1,595,000 in bonuses and $2,666,000 for expenses incurred.<sup>25</sup> Salvage claims were adjudicated in Key West, which made admiralty law a kind of local industry, and it is presumed that most of the money allowed in the cases was spent on the island.<sup>26</sup> While it is likely that such extensive activity as wrecking would have stimulated considerable construction in Key West, the majority of the buildings constructed during the ascendancy of wrecking were destroyed by the fires of 1859 and 1886.

The abundant marine life of Florida's coastal waters had lured Spanish and Bahamian fishermen to the Keys long before 1821, and fishing became a way of living for Key Westers.<sup>27</sup> Most wrecking crews engaged in fishing or turtling until a ship in distress came to their notice. Wrecking itself was too speculative to justify employing men and ships exclusively. In 1828, John Simonton estimated that nearly thirty American-owned fishing smacks, each capable of carrying five to seven thousand pounds of live fish, were engaged in the trade between Key West and Havana.<sup>28</sup> During the 1820s and 30s fishermen from Connecticut plied the waters off Key West and used its port and repair facilities when necessary. Some of these New Englanders eventually settled in the island community. Commercial fishing flourished, and it continued to hold an important place in the local economy into the twentieth century. In 1888, the local fleet had 82 vessels and employed 243 fishermen.<sup>29</sup> Establishment of an ice plant two years later aided the industry.

Turtling was closely allied to commercial fishing;<sup>30</sup> they were often carried out simultaneously throughout the nineteenth century. Two local attempts at canning turtle products, begun in 1849 and 1857, each lasted about a year. Not until the 1880s, when A. Granday opened his cannery, was turtling any more than a locally profitable hunting activity. Granday's processing plant continued operating under various ownerships until about 1910.<sup>31</sup>

For a time the sponge fishery made Key West as nationally prominent as had wrecking. In 1849, Key West entrepreneurs sent their first shipments of sponges to New York. Locally harvested sponges began to command as much as ten cents per pound.<sup>32</sup> The 1850s saw Key West sponging grow closer to maturity. Under pressure of substantial rises in price for Mediterranean sponges, demand for Florida sponges spiralled upward. Key West's propinquity to the sponge beds, together with islanders' acceptance of the hard life of the sea, gave her an advantage over other Florida competitors.<sup>33</sup> Between 1853 and 1861 as many as twelve vessels engaged in sponging. The fifties also marked the beginning of a noticeable trend of Bahamian immigration: many came to work in sponging. The influx peaked between 1870 and 1890.<sup>34</sup> By 1892, more than one-third of the island's population was Bahamian, and when sponging declined in importance, most remained. Thus, in addition to its obvious economic contributions, sponging was partly responsible for a substantial Bahamian presence in Key West.<sup>35</sup> Of the contributions of the sponge fishery to Key West's built environment, not much can be said. Though sponging stimulates the construction of some specialized structures, like warehouses and wharves, and clearing of open spaces for drying and auction purposes, no obvious structural evidences of this once-prominent local industry remain. The passage of time, Key West's limitations of space and readily available building materials, combined with the effects of Navy expansion, fire, and hurricanes, have virtually erased the traces of this important local industry.

Although wrecking, fishing, and other maritime industries provided the chief stimuli for Antebellum Key West, another activity which depended on the sea gained some prominence. Salt production, which peaked in the fifties and died with the War, was peculiarly adapted to Key West. Perry had stated that:

The Claimants of this island have great expectations from the extensive salt ponds, and indeed, many who have visited them . . . concurred in the opinion, that large quantities of salt may be derived from them.<sup>38</sup>

In 1829, it was reported that the salt ponds had been divided into lots and were available for leasing, and salt manufacturing operations began in earnest.<sup>37</sup> Production varied, ranging from forty thousand bushels in 1847, to a peak of seventy-five thousand bushels in 1855.<sup>38</sup> High production rates continued until the Civil War, when salt gathering was suspended for fear that shipments might fall into Confederate hands.<sup>39</sup> Although salt making resumed after the War, extensive hurricane damage in 1876 virtually halted salt manufacture in Key West. No structural evidence of this promising local endeavor exists.

An 1850 coast survey map of Key West, Stock Island, and the surrounding Keys indicates the extent to which the town of Key West had grown.<sup>40</sup> The tidal pond near the center of town is still visible, but development had spread beyond it in all directions. In fact, Key West had already spread beyond Whitehead's original plot though density of structures was not very great beyond the immediate harbor area. There are few representations of Key West during the period before the Civil War. What is known about the city has been assembled from literary sources, maps, and the like. It does appear that the catastrophes of the Antebellum period, the hurricane of 1846 and the fire of 1859, altered the cityscape only temporarily.<sup>41</sup> When rebuilt, the destroyed portions of Key West were said to appear much as they had prior to their destruction. The 1859 fire destroyed nearly all the structures northwest of Greene Street -- all of the wharves and warehouses, as well as most of the city's commercial buildings. They were apparently rebuilt in approximately the same locations, and properties in the area seem generally to have remained in the hands of their pre-fire proprietors. Buildings were generally constructed of wood, with wood siding, and they were rarely more than two and one-half stories in height. This was in keeping with the townscapes of other Florida port communities like Cedar Key and Apalachicola, although the waterfront of the latter city was noted for its brick warehouses.<sup>42</sup> Although brick may have been available to Antebellum Key Westers for use as a structural material, they apparently did not use it. Whether that was due to a comparative cost advantage in favor of wood or to an innate conservatism among people who looked to the sea for their living is not known and cannot be conjectured.

The Key West which existed on the eve of Civil War had taken the basic grid pattern set forth by Whitehead. Blocks were roughly square, though irregular in size compared with each other, and they ranged from 425 to 500 feet on a side. Division of lots within Whitehead's blocks and setbacks of buildings and their relation to each other were irregular. Buildings appear to have been constructed without any particular regard for their relationships to each other, a situation which may have arisen because Whitehead's streets were surveyed after the structures had been built. Thus, while the were located within formal blocks, many structures were oriented toward paths and alleys which existed before the streets came into existence. This is especially the case within areas of the Key West Historic District, even those repeatedly affected by fire and storm.<sup>43</sup>

The 1850 map also illustrates the extent to which the military had invested in Key West and prompts speculation about the degree to which such investment influenced the civilian development of the city. Fort Zachary Taylor is the most obvious symbol of the military presence in Key West, and it is significant in underlining the role of the island in the planned defense of the mainland United States. Fort Taylor, which stands outside the Key West Historic District, but which was a major presence in the island skyline, was a massive brick fortification begun in 1845. Brick for Taylor and for Fort Jefferson in the Dry Tortugas were brought in from the clay areas of the Gulf Coast and probably other areas farther north. Masons, all civilians, were imported from areas on the mainland. Some probably stayed on in Key West. Fort Taylor was the single largest masonry structure on Key West. Though it was building for nearly twenty years and underwent many modifications afterward, Fort Taylor exercised few known influences within the area of the Key West Historic District. While it may be that brick was an expensive material to import for use in civilian construction, it should be noted that for most of the city's existence, all major structural materials have had to be shipped in. One might expect choices between wood-frame or masonry construction to be made on some costing basis. However, there is no known discussion of choice, and the Key Westers appear to have continued building in wood from habit, even after the fires of 1859 and 1886 might have been expected to force changes in structural materials.<sup>44</sup>

When Florida seceded from the United States of America, Key West was a very significant place in Florida. It was the state's second largest, wealthiest, and most cosmopolitan city.<sup>45</sup> Key West's 1860 population was 2,862, which included 160 slaves and 451 free persons of color.<sup>46</sup> It had grown considerably from the rather spare place of the 1830s to a municipality which, in 1862, had eight hundred houses, twenty warehouses, four churches, four schools, and twenty-six stores.<sup>47</sup>

The city and island remained in Union hands during the Civil War, due to the isolation of the place from the rest of Florida's population centers, its heterogeneous population, and the status of the U.S. Military and Naval forces on the island as something of an institution.<sup>48</sup> Union retention of the island was also due in great part to the quick thinking of Captain James M. Brannon, who seized Fort Taylor for the Union on January 3, 1861.

The city has been assessed as dormant during the War. Its people lived under martial law, and little construction activity was recorded.<sup>49</sup> The military built environment was augmented by many structures, the most noteworthy of which were two small masonry forts called Martello Towers, built on the island's southern shore to protect that uninhabited area. The Martello Tower is extant.

Key West's period of greatest prosperity occurred during the half century between the end of the Civil War and the eve of World War I. The period coincides in large degree with the era of the most extensive development in the island's built environment. Such development was the result of the stabilizing and strengthening of the local economy in a period in which Key West operated within the national economy.

Civilian economic activity recovered slowly after the Civil War. Wrecking had already begun to decline owing to the construction of a series of lighthouses on the Florida Reef, and the future of salt was uncertain at best.<sup>50</sup> Fishing continued, but even a thriving Key West fishery could not support the island city. Two activities, sponging and cigar-making, both practiced before Civil War, grew rapidly during the late sixties to give the city renewed economic vitality.

Sponging expanded rapidly after the Civil War, fuelled by increased demand and rising costs for European sponges.<sup>51</sup> The rise to economic prominence of the sponge industry coincided to some extent with the late decline of wrecking. Although many newcomers, Bahamians and others, participated in the sponge industry, extensive participation by Key Westers, former wreckers, makes a probable case for sponging as a successful response to an economic crisis which threatened the livelihoods of local residents. Between 1879 and 1892, the fleet grew from 86 to 350; in 1902, about 1800 men were employed as sponge fishermen.<sup>52</sup>

Cigar-making provided considerable impetus for development in Key West during the late nineteenth century. Although cigar manufacture had been practiced on the island as early as<sup>53</sup> 1831, it was not until the 1870s that the industry became economically prominent. This came about largely as a result of a mass migration of Cubans to Key West. Many of the refugees had been cigar factory workers and owners. Tobacco and cigar production were activities in Cuba nearly equal in economic importance to sugar cane culture. When Vincente Martinez Ybor decided to locate his factory in Key West, other cigar entrepreneurs from both Cuba and the United States followed.<sup>54</sup> By 1876, there were twenty-nine factories on the island employing some twenty-one hundred Cubans as well as Bahamians.<sup>55</sup> In 1890, Key West cigar-makers produced more than 100 million hand-rolled cigars for exportation.<sup>56</sup>

Some of the cigar entrepreneurs, such as Eduardo H. Gato, Seidenburg and Company, and Ybor, contributed directly to the physical development of Key West through the construction of worker housing immediately adjacent to their factories.<sup>57</sup> The former Gato factory at Simonton and Virginia Streets illustrates this process of development. In the Bird's Eye View of 1884, this factory was depicted as a two and one-half story rectangular building set directly on the corner of Simonton and Virginia Streets. The building appears to have been devoid on any particular architectural detail. Directly opposite the factory on Simonton Street was a row of six modest one- or one and one-half story buildings of similar setback. Like the factory building, they appear to have been without any particular architectural distinction.<sup>58</sup>

The Bird's Eye View provides a detailed illustration of the city prior to the fire of 1886.<sup>59</sup> At this date, the city appears to have been densely settled from the wharf area south to roughly Angela Street between Emma and Margaret Streets. Another area of dense settlement was located south of Angela to Divison (now Truman) Street, approximately between Emma and Elizabeth Streets. Generally, the city appears to have been characterized by one and two-story structures placed either parallel or perpendicular to the street. Wood appears to have been the predominant exterior fabric, although some obviously masonry buildings, such as the Convent of Mary Immaculate and the U.S. Naval Depot did exist. The majority of the structures appear to have had one- or two-story porches on their street facades. The porches and street facades of these buildings appear in most cases to be the sole locations of any distinguishing architectural details, i.e., turned balusters, capitals, brackets, barge boards, and so on. A simple frame vernacular style appears to have been the prevailing building tradition. Most of the structures appear to have been dwellings. Mixed residential and commercial and strictly commercial buildings appear along Duval Street, the city's commercial corridor, and in the harbor area. Solely industrial structures, such as warehouses and wharves, lined the city's waterfront between Whitehead and Elizabeth Streets.

Although Key West appears to have been predominantly a low-rise community at this time, a few larger structures did punctuate the skyline. The three-story Convent of Mary Immaculate (demolished) with its dormered mansard roof and central tower dominated an undeveloped area of the city south of Division Street. Several steepled churches were also located in the city, among them the First M.E. Church at Simonton and Eaton Streets (extant) and the St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church at Duval and Eaton Streets (demolished). A large, three-story public school (demolished) occupied the center of the block bounded by Fleming, William, Southard and Elizabeth Streets. Other larger public buildings included the two-story, cupola-crowned Monroe County Courthouse (demolished) on Whitehead Street; a two-story hipped-roof Masonic Temple (demolished) on Simonton Street between Caroline and Eaton and the three-story Marine Hospital at Front and Emma Streets.

A visitor's description of Key West shortly before the fire of 1886 underlines the impression suggested by the Bird's Eye View:

It is densely settled, and about as Un-American as possible, bearing a strong resemblance to a West Indian town. The houses are of wood, plainly built, and, with few exceptions painted white. There are . . . only three brick buildings . . . Piazzas abound, and occasionally some lattice work is seen . . . The houses are of all sizes, jumbled up in the oddest way . . . The interior of each block is filled up with one-story shanties . 60. The lots have been divided, and subdivided.

Overall, both this description and the Bird's Eye View could, with slight modifications, be used in describing the present-day character of portions of the Key West Historic District.

Key West has suffered several major fires during its history, the most devastating of them being that of April 1, 1886. This conflagration completely destroyed a one-half mile wide strip of the business district roughly between Simonton and Whitehead Streets. Property losses were estimated to be more than three million dollars, while property covered by insurance totalled less than fifty thousand dollars.<sup>61</sup> The Jacksonville Times-Union described the results:

All of the wharves and warehouses are burnt;
all the large stores and cigar factories are gone;
nearly all the tobacco in stock and most of the provisions have been consumed by the remorseless flames . . . (and) ruin broods over the town . . .<sup>62</sup>

Despite the wholesale destruction and lack of insurance, the city recovered rapidly. The area destroyed by the fire was completely rebuilt, although, in spite of the continued threat of fire, wood continued to be the favored building material. Moreover, it appears that the same type of building stock which had typified the city prior to the fire, i.e., predominantly one and two-story wood frame structures of similar design and size continued to be constructed after the fire. Thus, post-fire structures within the Historic District provide a fairly accurate representation of their predecessors. It is this tendency toward architectural conservatism throughout much of the city's history which gives the Key West Historic District much of its marked homogeneity of scale, and materials, regardless of the age of individual structures.

The city continued to expand to the southeast during the nineties and well into the twentieth century. The 1889 Sanborn Fire Insurance map reveals that the area south of Angela Street between White and Salt Pond Road (now <sup>63</sup>Eisenhower Drive) to Division Street had been substantially developed by this time. The southern boundary of the City Cemetery, essentially undeveloped in the 1886 Bird's Eye View, had been densely settled by the time of the 1896 Sanborn.<sup>64</sup> The map also recorded pockets of development south of Division Street and to the east of White Street south of United Street.

A sizeable portion of the Key West Historic District, particularly the area south of Angela Street, is made up of structures built during the last decade of the nineteenth century and in the first two decades of the twentieth century. Building stock constructed during this period consisted primarily of one and two-story detached structures of wood frame construction. The front porch continues to be common to the street facade of these structures. Decorative details included turned columns and balusters, brackets, bargeboards and the use of a triangular window or attic vent in the gable of the street facade. Many of these structures appear to utilize the "shotgun" plan, an arrangement of three rooms whose doorways are aligned with the front and rear doors. Most structures fall into no formal category of style and can be classified as frame vernacular. The majority are residential in use although some mixed residential and commercial structures do occur. There are few solely commercial buildings.

The 1889 Sanborn map and subsequent Sanborns in 1896 and 1912 illustrate distinct racial and ethnic sections within the Key West Historic District.<sup>65</sup> Key West's area of black settlement, both present and historic, developed outside the original city limits south of Angela Street, largely between Whitehead and Fort Streets. The 1889 Sanborn recorded a concentration of "negro tenements" and a colored Baptist Church and African Odd Fellows Hall in this area. Another area of black settlement, described as "Buzzard's Roost," was located at the intersection of Simonton and Petronia Streets. Physically, these neighborhoods are composed primarily of single-story detached structures. Wood is the predominant exterior fabric. Most of these structures are very plain, although some of the dwellings display turned columns or balusters. Structures are predominantly residential in function.

The black population of post-Civil War Key West was originally composed almost exclusively of American-born freedmen and free negroes. Its membership was significantly enlarged during the late nineteenth century by the immigration of English-speaking Bahamians and other West Indians.<sup>66</sup> Although the majority of blacks worked as<sup>67</sup> common laborers, a significant number earned a living fishing and harvesting sponges.

The Cubans of the working class neighborhoods associated with cigar-making were located in areas close to or immediately adjacent to the factories in which they worked. Workers at the Pohalski factory generally lived in tract 6, those employed at Seidenberg's in tract 7; and tract 11 was occupied by workers from the Gato factory.<sup>68</sup> Surviving concentrations of what appear to have been workers' houses constructed by the cigar entrepreneurs are found on Olivia Street between White and Havana Streets and on Packer Street between United and Catherine. The former were associated with Pohalski's, the latter with the Armas de Oro factory.<sup>69</sup> Physically, these subdivisions are characterized by single-story structures of similar size and setback. Wood is the major exterior fabric. Decorative detail is sparse to nearly totally absent; when present, it is confined to the street facade. Many of these structures appear to utilize the shotgun plan.

The March, 1889, Trade Edition of the Key West Equator--Democrat stated that Key West had 106 cigar factories which employed ten or more hands during peak periods. Most of the factories were, like the other buildings on the island, constructed of wood. A minority of the cigar factories, perhaps five or six, were of masonry construction. Of these, the E.H. Gato factory at Simonton and Virginia Streets and the Armas de Oro factory at Catherine and Grinnel Streets are extant.<sup>70</sup> The Sanborn maps suggest most of the cigar factories were long, rectangular buildings generally two- to three- and one-half stories high. Many factories had a series of triangular bays apparently used to capture north light. Such bays were a convention in Key West cigar manufacturing in the days before artificial light of good quality was available.<sup>71</sup> The bays are no longer present on the surviving factories.

Cigar-making and sponging declined in local importance near the end of the century, signifying the onset of a period of economic crisis and readjustment which lasted for nearly forty years.<sup>72</sup> Following the destruction of his cigar factories in the 1886 fire, Ybor, attracted by inducements offered by the Tampa Board of Trade, moved his Florida operations to the outskirts of Tampa.<sup>73</sup> There, he and his associates began construction of a factory town called Ybor City. Their success in luring Ybor away from Key West prompted the Tampans to make overtures to other island manufacturers. In 1894, despite intense and convoluted negotiations over a decision to employ Spaniards instead of Cuban refugees, Seidenberg also decided to move to Tampa.<sup>74</sup> Others followed. These relocations effectively ended cigar manufacturing as an organized industry in Key West.<sup>75</sup> By the early 1920s, the last Key West cigar factory had gone out of business and cigar-making reverted to cottage industry status.<sup>76</sup>

The decline of the Key West sponge fishery came in large part as the result of the industry's movement to deepwater harvesting techniques alien to the islanders.<sup>77</sup> Nearness to shallow water sponge beds no longer gave Key West an advantage in production. The industry virtually disappeared from Key West by the turn of the century. Warehouses, markets, and other structures identifiable with the sponge industry no longer remain. Only residences built by money earned in the sponge trade and such commercial structures as could be readily adapted to other purposes remain, and these are difficult to pinpoint.<sup>78</sup>

At the same time these industries were declining, renewed economic vitality for Key West in the form of Henry Flagler's celebrated Overseas Railway seemed assured. Several factors combined to make construction of such a railroad economically feasible. At the turn of the century, Key West was substantially larger than Miami. It boasted a harbor capable of handling ships with a draft of thirty feet, while Miami could accommodate vessels drawing only twelve. A further consideration was the increased trade between Key West and Havana which had resulted from the Spanish-American War.<sup>79</sup> However, the overriding factor was the proposed canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Flagler learned of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty in January, 1905, from his good friend Secretary of State Elihu Root, and that convinced him that there would be a compelling need for a railroad to Key West in order to protect the canal.<sup>80</sup>

The Overseas Railway took seven years to complete at a cost of about twenty-seven million dollars and two hundred laborers' lives.<sup>81</sup> The Railway's Key West terminus was located on landfill on the island's northwest shore. Passengers were thus able to step directly from the railroad into Havana-bound boats for the ninety mile voyage to Cuba. This area is presently occupied by the Trumbo Naval Air Station.

While it was hailed as an engineering marvel, the Overseas Railway never became profitable for the railway nor the cause of an economic boom for Key West. Freight or passenger traffic sufficient to warrant its construction never materialized. Further, the railway generated very little economic activity in Key West. With its limited hotel accommodations, there was little inducement for tourism in Key West at the time.<sup>82</sup> Nor does it appear that an effort to provide such facilities was ever made: aside from its yards and docks, no new construction directly attributable to the Railway occurred in Key West during the teens or twenties.

Key West prospered during World War I. As the "Rock of the Caribbean," the island's role was as guardian to the recently completed Panama Canal. Construction of a seaplane base, a submarine basin and military housing preceding the arrival of troops greatly stimulated the local economy for a time. However, military activity on Key West was curtailed after the Armistice. The loss of this traditional economic bedrock; a decline in the city's status as a major stopping point along the Gulf-Caribbean-Atlantic shipping lanes, due in part to the success of the Isthmian Canal; the end of sponging; and the decay of the cigar-making industry, marked the end of an era of dynamic growth of the built environment of Key West.<sup>83</sup> This cessation of the expansion or renewal of Key West's building stock about 1920, at a time when the
