DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Exterior: Except for a few minor changes the Orangeburg County Jail follows the plans drawn up by architects Edward C. Jones and Francis D. Lee. The two story rectangular structure has a five-brick-thick foundation gradually sloping into two-brick-thick walls. The exterior is covered with cement, a technique originally intended to give the effect of stone. A continuous string course runs between the two stories. Horizontal lines are further emphasized by the projecting foundation, sailing courses under the roof, and the continuous crenellations. Corner turrets, windows, and the main tower provide vertical interest stabilizing the horizontals.

Resembling a small impregnable fortress, the front elevation is dominated by the central tower which contains a large pointed arched window. Just below the tower is a one story projecting porch with crenellated roof line. A pointed arch leads through the porch to the single rectangular doorway. Arrow slit openings on each side and low buttresses on the sides and front provide the porch with further ornamental details. Windows on the second story are long and narrow in contrast to the shorter windows on the lower story. All four windows are surmounted by drip moulding.

East and west elevations both have three label-headed windows on the second story. Whereas the east side has three windows on the first story, the west side has a projecting porch and doorway. What remains of the original rear elevation is devoid of ornamentation as specified in the plans. An addition completed in 1922 which extends from the west half of the building is in keeping with this purely functional character.

Interior: The interior was divided into cells for prisoners on the second floor and offices on the main floor. Executions were performed by hanging in the central tower.

During Sherman's march through Orangeburg in February 1865 the jail was burned. An illustration in Leslie's Illustrated Journal, April 8, 1865, showing the smouldering building, along with contracts between John Lucas and the Orangeburg Building Commissioners designating areas of repair, indicate that most of the damage was done to the interior. Whereas Lucas modernized the interior, he restored the exterior to its original appearance.

Surroundings: The building is in extreme danger of being demolished, an act which would result in a loss not only to the city of Orangeburg, but to the state as well. What survives from the architectural firm of Jones and Lee should be preserved, especially a building as unusual and well proportioned as this one.

Designed by the Charleston architectural firm Jones and Lee, the Orangeburg County Jail is one of the rare examples of Gothic castellated architecture in South Carolina. The fortress-like style is uniquely suited to the building's primary function of confining prisoners.

Architecture: During the 1840s this neo-gothic style was a popular design for penal institutions in England. Edward Brickell White (1806-1882) appears to have been the first architect in the Charleston area to employ this style in his remodeling of the Old Citadel in 1850. Undoubtedly inspired by Brickell's work and perhaps by English precedents, Charlestonians Francis D. Lee (1826-1885) and Edward C. Jones (working c1848-1861) submitted their plans in 1857 to the Orangeburg County Building Commissioners. Jones and Lee enjoyed a statewide reputation for their designs of courthouses, banks, churches, and private residences, which viewed together demonstrate the eclectic nature of their architecture.

After receiving the plans from Jones and Lee, the building commissioners employed John Lucas, a local architect from England, to supervise construction according to more detailed specifications. Lucas agreed to complete the building before July 1, 1860 for a fee of $10,000. He also handled the repairs after the building was damaged by Union soldiers.

Although not nearly as grand as its English predecessors, the Orangeburg County Jail is a unique architectural achievement.
