Windermere
Windermere, Orange County
Description

Summary Paragraph

The Windermere Town Hall is a one and a half story, wood frame, Colonial Revival style building that was constructed in 1922 as a women's club and moved to its present site in 1938 for use as a community center and town hall. The rectangular plan structure has a one-story wing on its southwest elevation and rests on a concrete block foundation. The side gable main roof is surfaced with asphalt shingles and has three gable dormers on both the front and rear slopes. A flat built-up roof covers the wing of the town hall. The present exterior siding is asbestos shingles, and a one-story portico shelters the entrance on the main facade. The main windows of the building are 6/6 light double hung sashes. Although the only major change to the exterior of the building since 1938--when the wing was added--has been the covering of the original wood siding with asbestos shingles, numerous changes have been made to the interior of the structure and few original finishes remain visible.

Supporting Narrative

Picturesque "Windermere Among the Lakes" is a town of fewer than 2,000 residents located on the Butler chain of lakes in west Orange County, Florida. These freshwater lakes form a 15 mile navigable waterway with more than 120 miles of shoreline. The area attracts sport fishermen, boaters, water skiers and nature lovers from nearby Florida communities and all parts of the nation. The community lies just 12 miles southwest of Orlando and is located near U.S. Highway I-4 and the Sunshine Parkway, a limited access intrastate thoroughfare. It is a bedroom community for persons working in the vicinity of Disney World and Orlando who desire a more "rural" atmosphere. Nestled in an approximately 360 acre tract of land bounded by three lakes, Windermere is almost an island.

Windermere is a woodsy village of moss covered oaks and mainly unpaved streets having a quiet turn of the century charm that is reflected in its venerable houses, quaint shops and "Old English" lampposts that dot the streets. The big city life of Orlando is less than 20 minutes away via I-4, and modern shopping centers nearby offer all the necessities of modern life. The downtown of Windermere is just three blocks long and features a country store, antique shop, and Kountry Kitchen restaurant. Public facilities and attractions include a youth center, public tennis courts, library, and a sprinkling of historic buildings, including a church and the town hall.

The Windermere Town Hall occupies a prominent position in the Town Square of the community of Windermere, a centrally located tract of land within the three square block of the downtown commercial area. The building was constructed in 1922 as the headquarters of the Windermere Women's Club and stood at the end of Butler Avenue on the shore of Lake Butler. In 1937, the structure was donated by the club members to the Town of Windermere for use as a governmental facility. At that time, the community had no permanent meeting place for its elected officials. The building was moved to its present location in the heart of the town of Windermere, and a number of changes were made to the exterior appearance of the structure.

The building is a one and a half story, wood frame structure with a steeply pitched side gable roof. The total floor space in the building is 3,640 square feet, of which 3,240 square feet is found on the ground floor. There is also a 400 square foot mezzanine storage area at the northern end of the structure. The major interior spaces include a 1,680 square foot meeting hall with a 150 square foot stage, a 400 square foot kitchen, and 430 square feet of storage, rest rooms, circulation and support areas. There is a flat, built-up roof over this section.

The building measures approximately 78 feet by 40 feet at its greatest extensions. The wing at the southern end of the building measures approximately 18 feet by 40 feet. Today the 3,640 square foot building contains a meeting hall with a low stage, a kitchen, a storage mezzanine, and restrooms and storage space in the one-story wing. Meetings of the town council and various other civic functions are still conducted in the meeting hall, but all the administrative offices which were originally found in the wing of the town hall were moved in 1992 to a modern, one-story, concrete block facility that stands nearby in Town Square. The square also contains the recently constructed Chase Memorial Library, an antique shop, a basketball court, shuffleboard court, and parking area. The streets around Town Square are unpaved except for a half block on the north which provides access to the post office, commercial offices, and a convenience store. Main Street running north-south and Sixth Avenue, running east, are the only traffic arteries leading out of town.

A photograph of the women's club before it was donated to the city in the late 1930s shows that the original structure was a wood frame vernacular building with drop siding and a pergola, instead of the more usual porch, on the main facade. The five-bay structure, which was draped with vines, sheltered three sets of French doors that were later replaced by the present portico, entranceway and 6/6 double hung sash windows. The main windows had 9/6 lights, the uppermost three lights probably being a transom. The dormer windows remained unchanged after the move. The interior of the women's club reportedly featured a main assembly hall, as does the present structure, with an interior balcony on the end where the mezzanine is located. There was also a kitchen but the building had no inside toilets.

A photograph taken c. 1938 or 1939 shows the town hall on its new site with all of the principal changes having been made. The wing and portico are in place, and a sign at the front of the portico reads "Windermere Community House." A chimney, absent on the Women's Club, now stands between the juncture of the main block of the building and the southwest wing. This chimney is still extant, as is the fireplace which is found on the southwest wall of the meeting hall. A photo of the rear of the building verifies the existence of the second set of dormers at that time and also the two small shed porches that are today found on the rear elevation of the structure. The asbestos shingle siding was probably applied to the building sometime in the 1940s, which was also when the number of lights in the upper window sashes were reduced from nine to six. The only other notable changes to the exterior of the building have been the installation of a wooden wheelchair access ramp on the rear elevation and the removal of the roof balustrade from the one-story wing. Such a feature deteriorates rapidly when left exposed to the weather in the warm and humid climate of Central Florida.

The interior of the town hall has apparently been renovated several times. The knotty pine paneling of the south wall of the assembly hall (Photos 28 & 29) is probably original, and the brick fireplace appears to be in its original condition, but nearly all of the other finishes have been changed. Modern composite wall paneling, drop ceilings, florescent lighting fixtures, ceiling fans and vinyl floor tiles are all later additions. The finishes in the wing of the building show similar changes.

Windermere Town Hall
Windermere, Orange County
Significance

Section number 8 Page 1

Summary Paragraph

The Windermere Town Hall is significant under Criterion A in the areas of Community Planning and Development, Politics and Government, Social Activity, and Recreation and Culture for having been the center of government and cultural activity in the small Orange County community for more than half a century. Also, the physical focus of the Town of Windermere changed with the creation of Town Square when the building was relocated to its present site in 1938.

Supporting Narrative

The town of Windermere reportedly had its origins about 1886 when an Englishman named Stanley Scott purchased approximately 160 acres in the area of Lake Butler and built his home there, giving it and the surrounding orange groves the name of Windermere, taken it has been supposed from the Lake Windermere region of England. Other settlers followed, some of them also from England, and established orange groves. A formal town site for the community of Windermere was laid out in 1887 when the Florida Midland Railway was constructed through the area. The Plant Investment Company recorded the town plat in 1889.

The community remained little more than a service and maintenance stop for the railroad for most of the following decade. Development of the area abruptly ended when disastrous freezes in the winter of 1895-1896 destroyed many of the citrus groves that had been planted along the shores of the surrounding lakes. Development was once again renewed in 1910 when J.C. Palmer and Howard Johnson, two Ohio natives, purchased the town site and formed the Windermere Improvement Company. All that remained of the earlier settlement was one log cabin and a roofless house. Palmer constructed a residence for himself that today is still occupied by his descendants. The partners advertised their new town site widely, promoting the attractiveness of the surrounding countryside and boasting of its potential for recreational activity, particularly hunting and fishing. The residents of nearby Orlando came to build summer cottages and fishing camps. Other Ohio natives also came to the small village to construct winter residences.

During World War I, the ladies of Windermere began to meet regularly to make surgical dressings, knit sweaters, and make and gather other materials to donate to the war effort. These meetings resulted in the formation of the Windermere Women's Club. A clubhouse for the group was built by the Windermere Improvement Company in 1922 on a plot of land at the end of Butler Street on the shore of Lake Butler.

The 1920 census listed Windermere as having a population of 182. Although the town site of Windermere had been platted as early as 1889, the settlement was not formally incorporated until 1925. A meeting was held on February 2, 1925 at the Women's Club for the purpose of organizing a municipal government. For more than a decade after the town was incorporated, the town government had no permanent meeting place. Elected officers and citizens often met in the general store that contained the post office or at the women's club on Lake Butler. There the residents of Windermere met to discuss problems and determine what actions needed to be taken to improve the community and attract new residents.

By the 1930s, the population of Windermere had dropped to 153 because of the effects of the Great Depression. Hard times also brought about a drop in the membership of the local women's club, and the remaining members decided to donate the clubhouse to the city fathers for use as a town hall. Residents of the community thought that the facility should be located in the center of Windermere, so the porch was removed and the building was placed on planks and rollers and pulled by a Model "A" Ford to its present location on Main Street. Once on its new site, the facility was renovated using WPA funds, attaining the appearance that it still largely has today.

The moving of the building to its present site for use as the seat of the municipal government created a town square that became the physical and visual focal point for the renewed development of the small community. Other public facilities, including a library, new city offices, and recreational facilities have been constructed in the square since the 1960s. In addition to being the location of local governmental activity, innumerable public entertainments have been held in the town hall in its more than fifty years of existence. As the only community meeting facility, it was the scene of dances, testimonial dinners, and various social functions. Educational programs, plays, and other cultural activities were also held there. The commercial district of Windermere grew up around the town hall, and the traditional "town square" setting has attracted tourists
