Rock Ca	astle is a	two-st	orŷ limes	stone hous	e done in	the federal

Rock Castle is a two-story limestone house done in the federal style as it was interpreted in Tennessee. The house was begun in 1784 and took approximately seven years to construct. Timber was cut in the surrounding area for use and a quarry was opened nearby to provide the stone.

The house is built in the shape of an "L" with the stem of the "L" containing four rooms. The parlor, or more formal living room, is on the east side of the ground floor with a central hall containing the rather simple stair dividing it from the family living room on the west side. The dining room is located immediately behind the family living quarters. On the second floor are three bedrooms, all spacious with ample lighting provided by windows on this level. The basement contains the area probably used for cooking and preparing meals. The floor is now concrete; however, it was an earthen floor in the early days.

The stone was originally cemented with lime mortar and sand. In places it has been improperly repointed with concrete because rain had washed away some of the mortar. The stones were placed length-wise and width-wise alternately in a flemish-bond pattern, although there is no real adherence to this rule throughout the building.

The original roof was made of smooth pine shingles that withstood rain and snow for over one hundred years. The wood shingles have since been replaced with a slate roof so heavy it has caused the rafters to bow under its weight.

The house has a large stone chimney at either end of the main house with another in the ell. The chimneys extend slightly out from the main wall to create an effect with light and shade. The house has a fortress effect with no windows in the ends of the main house except small attic lights. The front of the house has eight windows and two doors - one opening on the upstairs porch and one below. The four lower windows contain 12 over 12 panes while the upper four contain 8 over 8. The upper door was originally a window but was converted to a door in the 1850 s when the house was "modernized" to include a Greek Revival type porch with balcony.

The interior of Rock Castle is simple and exhibits excellent workmanship. The wood paneling in the rooms and the stairways and banisters were done by a carpenter who was very skilled with his tools, but unfamiliar with more ornate design. The wood graining in the parlor is an 1850's addition and is expertly done and well preserved. The other woodwork is original with original floors and very few interior changes.

With the exception of dormers added on the ell, a concrete porch at the rear, electricity and running water, the house is little changed. However, the setting is very different from the large farm operation that was carried on. A large lake created in the area inundated most of the outbuildings and surrounding land. Only the stone smokehouse remains and it had to be moved to higher ground when the lake was filled: ...

Daniel Smith came with his family from Virginia in 1583 and settled in the Cumberland River area on Drake's Greek in Smith was born to respected members of Virginia colonial society and was educated at William and Mary College. After schooling Smith was appointed deputy surveyor in Virginia. He also served in the colonial militia and was important in the defense of the southwest area of Virginia during many Indian When hostilities between the British and colonists began, Smith was elected to the Committee of Safety in Fincastle County, Virginia, in 1775. He was later appointed Justice of the Peace in Virginia County by Governor Patrick Henry and was promoted to major in the colonial militia. All this practical experience in local government would serve him well in Middle Tennessee later.

Sec. 21 32 In 1779 Smith was commissioned along with four other men to survey the boundary claims of the lands westward between Virginia and North Carolina. This project forced Smith to be away from home for one year, and ended in a quarrel between the states over the correct line. The dispute was settled in 1791 when both state legislatures recognized the "Walker Line," named for one member of the Virginia party, as correct.

Upon returning home from his activities in the west, Smith joined his militia unit and assisted in the American victory at King's Mountain. After the victory he returned home to Washington County, By 1783 he heard the westward call and came with his Virginia. family to Middle Tennessee. He had passed through this area earlier on a surveying trip and knew it well. By 1788 Smith had accumulated 4,722 acres of land in Sumher County where he built his home, Rock Castle, and lived the remainder of his life.

His popularity and experience in government meant that he was soon appointed to public office. In 1783 he was appointed a member of the first county court; in 1784 he was appointed official surveyor for the Middle Tennessee region; he was appointed secretary of the "territory south of the river Ohio" by President Washington; he served twice as a representative at a convention called by North Carolina to vote on ratification of the Federal Constitution; he served on a five man delegation from Sumner County that helped draw up a state constitution in 1796; in 1796 Smith was appointed a presidential elector for the state; he was appointed in 1798 to fill the unexpired U. S. Senate term of Andrew Jackson; and, in 1805, after two unsuccessful tries, he was elected to the U. S. Senate, during which time he contributed a great deal in dealing with western problems. He resigned in 1809 with 2 years remaining in his term to return home to Rock Castle.

On June 16, 1818, Smith died and was buried at Rock Castle. He had spent most of his seventy years in government affairs and helped to lay solid foundations for government in the state of Tennessee. He was overshadowed by men with greater personal charisma, but his contributions cannot be ignored.

His home still stands as a monument to him and has recently been purchased by the Tennessee Historical Commission for restoration and preservation. With development of this property, understanding will be gained of an outstanding man, and early Tennessee homes and pioneer life.
