Located on the banks of the Mississippi and still popular with tourists and fishermen in the western part of Wisconsin, the Old Denniston House was built in the hope that it would become the home of the territorial legislature. The fourth floor was a ballroom intended for State celebrations, and on the second floor there was a large chamber intended to be the State Supreme Court but later converted into an apartment. The building remained empty for 18 years until it was purchased and opened as the Denniston House Hotel by Governor Nelson Dewey.

As it was built it was a four-story, brick structure trimmed in white-painted wood. Its windows had stone lintels and sills, and the corners of its facade, were ornamented with brick piers which had stone capitals. The overall appearance of the building was Federal. It had a gently pitched roof marked at each end by corbie-stepped gables which rose to double chimneys, and surmounted by a square bandbox with a widow's walk. A wooden porch elevated from the street ran the length of the front of the hotel. This porch had a flat roof supported by flattened gothic arches which gave it a simple but rather elegant appearance which was enhanced by the character of the entrances. There were three of these: a main entrance door with an arched fanlight and sidelights; and flanking that, French doors. The windows on the first level flanking these entrances were large, single panels of glass.

A number of alterations have occurred to change the character of the Old Denniston House. The fourth floor was removed some years ago as it was rarely used and was a favorite locale for bats. The corbie stepped gables and the bandbox have disappeared, and now the roof of the hotel is flat, marked only by two short chimneys at each end. The corner piers with their stone capitals have also disappeared, and the building is now square and plain. The porch has been altered to have a sloping roof and is supported by straight wooden posts. The entrance has also undergone some alteration. The large panes of glass have been replaced by smaller double panes, the French doors have been filled in, and alterations to the main entrance make it appear shorter and more square.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Old Denniston House is a hotel associated with the life of Nelson Dewey, the first governor of Wisconsin. Born in Connecticut, Dewey came to Wisconsin from New York as a clerk for the Daniels, Denniston Company. This company was interested in land speculation and bought the site of present day Cassville in the hope that it would be chosen as the capital of the Territory of Wisconsin because of its central location: in those days Wisconsin included what are now Iowa, Minnesota and part of the Dakotas. The Daniels, Denniston Company built the Denniston House in 1836 hoping that it would house the new capitol. Instead, Madison became the capital and the Denniston Company went bankrupt.

Nelson Dewey went to nearby Lancaster to read law and returned to Cassville to practice. He became register of deeds for Grant County and served in the territorial assembly. In 1848, at the age of 36, Dewey became the state's first governor. He served for two terms and in 1854 returned to Cassville. Dewey's land speculations and law practice had turned him into a rich man and he bought the Denniston House and operated it as a hotel. Dewey also owned most of the townsite of Cassville and supported its growth. He spent much of his time building his estate at Stonefield near Cassville, and was known both for his eccentricities and for his philanthropies. The panic of 1873 broke Dewey's fortune and not long after that a fire at Stonefield ruined his home. His wife and he separated and he moved into Cassville to live. For a while he roomed in a private home, but finally he moved into the Denniston House which he no longer owned. Dewey returned to the practice of law to make a living, but died in poverty in his room in the Denniston House in 1889. In his last years Dewey was a frequent sight on the porch of the hotel, talking politics and smoking his pipe. At his death he was all but forgotten by the state he had served.

Old Denniston House

8. Significance.

Nelson Dewey's palatial estate Stonefield, located near Cassville, was placed on the National Register in 1970. However, due to Dewey's financial collapse in the 1870's, he lived at Stonefield for a shorter period than he did at the Denniston House. This longevity and the building's associations with Dewey's declining years are the fundamental reasons for the significance of the site.

A secondary area of significance is the association of the building with the period of Wisconsin's territorial history when the state capital was selected. Many communities vied for the honor, and the Denniston House was built speculatively to house the capitol. It enjoys, therefore, a unique position in Wisconsin's history as what one could call a "noncapitol."

[Though the building is one of the older large structures in Wisconsin, "architecture" has not been marked as an area of significance. This is due to the substantial amount of modification which has taken place during the past 138 years.]
