Continuation SheetSection number 7 Page 1 Cherry Bank
Clinton County, Iowa*Narrative Description

Cherry Bank is located at 1458 Main Avenue in the City of Clinton, Clinton County, Iowa. The property consists of a large brick dwelling, with an attached garage. A modern horse barn/machine shed is located to the northeast but is outside of the nominated property boundaries. Cherry Bank is located on its original 12-acre parcel, which is a narrow but long lot oriented north-south and fronting Main Avenue. The house is set back on a high ridgetop, with the four-acre front lawn sloping down from the house to the road. Large pine trees line the driveway that extends along the west side of the property up to a circle drive on the west side of the house. Shade and other pine trees are scattered in front of the house and the front yard, with a concentration of walnut trees along the east property line. There is a rail fence along the front drive and continuing around the front of the house yard proper. A wire fence extends along the east property line. The remainder of the property to the north is rolling terrain and largely wooded with some pasturage. The actual nominated boundary encompasses 1.3 acres immediately surrounding the house and is demarcated by existing fencelines on three sides and the driveway on the fourth side.

House

The house was built in 1871 and is a large, two-story brick dwelling designed in the Italianate style of architecture. It has an asphalt-shingled, truncated hip roof that has a wrought iron railing around the original "widow's walk," although this is not the original railing. The roof has an overhang that is bracketed with paired, scrolled brackets attached to a wide friezeboard that is further decorated with dentils and a circular cut pattern. The dwelling is frame, with a veneer of locally-manufactured brick. The main body has a red brick veneer accented with a buff-colored brick used for the quoins, shaped lintels, and at the water table course. The foundation is of cut limestone blocks, also a locally-obtained product. The front facade has a double-wide door to the left (west), with two tall, narrow segmental-arched windows to the right. The second floor has three segmental-arched windows across. The front door is round-arched, with an arched transom window, newer double doors, and post-1960 concrete stoop and steps. The windows are an interesting double-hung type with fixed-four panes as the lower and largest panel, with a segmental-arched fixed two-pane above. Both panels move up or down for the double-hung effect. The windows all have stone sills.

The east side has a one-story rounded bay window on the rear "bump-out" of the T-shaped main core of the house. Behind this main core is another two-story ell original to the house that exhibits the same window treatment and decorative details as the front core. However, the two stories of this ell do not achieve the same full height of the front core, with the rear portion generally masked from view by the east and west bump-outs of the front core (see attached photographs). Added to the east side is a post-1960 screened-in porch/sunroom and covered porch that replaced the original porch entirely. According to a historic photograph of this house taken in 1884, this east-side porch extended the full length of this rear ell, was supported by chamfered posts, and had a railing on the roof level (see attached photocopy).

The original front porch was an open portico-type porch over the front entry, with the steps in much the same configuration as the present concrete stoop and steps. This porch was supported by chamfered posts and had a railing around the roof edge. A third porch was on the east side of the main core extending between the bump-out and the front facade. The style of this third porch mirrored that of the other two porches. There is a doorway from the bump-out at this location that once led out onto this porch. Presently, there is a small concrete stoop and steps that leads out from this side door. All three porches were removed in the twentieth century, with the front porch reportedly taken off in the 1920s (Schmitt 1980).

Originally, there was another ell off the rear that was one-story in height. This brick ell has since been entirely removed but was partially visible in the 1884 photograph. It housed the original summer kitchen of the house. This rear ell was replaced with the present two-stall garage, which was added after 1960.

Cherry Bank
Clinton County, Iowa

This is a one-story, hip-roofed, two-stall garage attached to the rear ell of the house. It has an asphalt-shingled hip roof, vertical wood board siding that is stained, and a concrete foundation and slab floor. The garage door is a single overhead. The garage was added to the house after 1960.

Horse Barn/Machine Shed

Built in 1970 and designed by current owner, Pete Cottral, this is a two-level, gambrel-roofed barn/machine shed. It has an asphalt-shingled roof, vertical board siding, and a concrete foundation. This building is located outside, and northeast of, the nominated property boundaries.

Non-Extant Buildings

The property in its entirety once included a two-story brick coachhouse, a brick three-hole privy, and a linear arrangement of frame buildings that housed a blacksmith shop, stable, and smokehouse among other dependencies. All of these buildings were still standing into the 1960s but were in a poor state of repair. The current owners determined that the building could not be saved, and all were razed. The coachhouse was to the northeast of the extant dwelling, while the frame buildings were to the north and northwest of the house. There are no above-ground remains or ruins of these buildings, with the ground leveled and likely bulldozed. As such, the archaeological potential is probably greatly diminished and, at present, not considered a contributing component to this property. However, most of the former outbuilding locations are encompassed within the current nominated property boundaries.

Effects of Proposed Clinton-Mill Creek Expressway on Property

The proposed construction of the Clinton-Mill Creek Expressway will cut across the southeast corner of the front lawn requiring removal of most of the walnut trees along the east fenceline, one large pine tree, and part of the east boundary fenceline. Both the fenceline and the trees are twentieth-century additions to the property. The highway corridor will not impact the entrance into this property, nor will it impact the main viewshed up to the house, nor the house or immediate house-yard. There is no evidence that the front lawn area of Cherry Bank was ever part of a designed landscape, nor are there any remnants of the cherry trees once planted here (Rogers 1998). While certainly the new roadway will impact the ambiance of this pastoral setting, the landscape surrounding the house will survive intact along with the tree-lined entry drive and the main view of the house. As a result, the nominated boundaries for Cherry Bank are confined to the 1.3 acres that encompass the house and bounded on three sides by existing fencelines (see attached map).

Clinton County, Iowa*Statement of Significance

Cherry Bank is locally significant under Criterion C for its architectural significance as a well-preserved example of an elaborate Late Victorian Italianate-styled country home built in the rural environs of the City of Clinton, Iowa, in 1871. It was built by Marcus Warren, who intended the house to be a home for his soon-to-be married nephew. Being a man of considerable means, Warren spared no expense in making the house and grounds a local showplace. While the nephew never lived in the house, having had a falling out with his uncle before he took possession of the property, it became the home of Dr. Augustus L. Ankeny, a prominent local physician, who along with his wife, Valeria (Perrin) Ankeny, and their six children lived in the house for nearly 16 years. It was during the Ankeny family's tenure, that the property became known as Cherry Bank for the large number of cherry trees that the family planted on the grounds. It also became well known for social gatherings of the Clinton society elite. Subsequent owners included Stephen Briggs, J. and Amy Renken, Henry and Annie (Lindmeier) Bremer, George Lindmeier, and the current owners, Earl "Pete" and Sylvia (Lindmeier) Cottral. The period of significance and the significant date, is the year that the house was completed, 1871.

According to land transfer data for this property, "Marcus Warren, a batcheler [sic] of Sauk City, Wisconsin" purchased the land from Priscilla Winchell in 1869 and subsequently transferred the property to "Andrew Warren, Jr., of Chicago, Illinois" on September 7, 1870, for $600 (Property Abstract as transcribed by Sylvia Cottral). The house itself was begun in 1870 and completed in 1871. Reportedly, Marcus (or Dennis, depending upon the source consulted) Warren, built the house as a wedding gift for his nephew. It is assumed that the Andrew Warren noted in the property abstract was this nephew. "Being a man of means, [Marcus]Warren spared no expense in making a showplace of the homes and grounds" (Streit n.d.). It is not known who exactly Marcus (or Dennis) Warren was; however, one source noted that "Dennis" Warren was "one of the most influential men in the county in early years" but did not state the reason for his influence or importance (LePrevost 1930). An examination of the Clinton business directory in the 1874 county atlas, gave no listings for either Dennis or Marcus Warren (Harrison and Warner 1874). The property abstract indicated that Marcus Warren was living in Sauk City, Wisconsin, in 1869, and it is suspected that he was involved in the lumber business. Perhaps he had a logging business in the forests of Wisconsin, with the logs floated downriver to Clinton where they were sawn into lumber. Sauk City is on the Wisconsin River upstream from Prairie Du Chien where the Wisconsin River drains into the Mississippi. It is known that the lumber and sawmill industries were among the most important industries in the early development of the City of Clinton, with so much lumber sawn that much of the bottomland along the riverfront actually consists of tons of sawdust. Many a lumber baron was born out of the riches to be made in this industry, perhaps Marcus Warren was among them. He certainly was a man of considerable means given the lavishness of the gift of this elaborate, fully furnished home and grounds to his nephew. Unfortunately for the nephew, the two had a falling out and neither Marcus Warren nor his nephew ever lived in this house.

The property was subsequently traded or sold to Dr. Augustus L. Ankeny, a "pioneer Lyons physician" (Streit n.d.), who along with his wife, Valeria Perrin, "daughter of one of the first families to be established in Clinton" (LePrevost 1930), and their six children moved into the fully furnished house. According to the property abstract, Ankeny purchased the property for a consideration of $20,000, on May 3, 1871, the price difference between the 1870 sale to Andrew Warren of $600 and this sale suggesting that the house had been built in the interim (i.e., between September 1870 and May 1871) (Property Abstract as transcribed by Sylvia Cottral). The Ankeny family lived here for 15-16 years, eventually selling the property to Stephen Briggs in 1887. Briggs, in turn, transferred the property to J. and Amy Renken (ibid.).

During the Ankeny family's tenure, the front acreage of the property was used "for the garden and pasture," and the place soon became "a rendezvous for the society folk of the community" (LePrevost 1930). It became known as "Cherry Bank" for the large number of cherry trees planted on the grounds. Dr. Ankeny did not practice medicine during the period when he lived at Cherry Bank, rather he concentrated on his "capitalistic ventures and activities" (ibid.). At its peak, Cherry Bank included not only the large brick home, but a two-story brick coach or carriage house, a brick privy, and a collection of frame building to the north (rear) of the house that included a stable, blacksmith shop, and various other dependencies. Of these former buildings, only the brick house remains standing.

In 1905, Cherry Bank was purchased by Henry and Annie (Lindmeier) Bremer from the Renkens (Property Abstract as transcribed by Sylvia Cottral). The Bremers divorced in 1934, with Annie retaking her maiden name. Annie Lindmeier's brother, George Lindmeier, obtained a life interest in the property in 1939 and occupied the house until his death in 1962. At that time, Annie and George's niece, Sylvia (Lindmeier) Cottral and her husband, Earl "Pete" Cottral, became the full owners and occupants of Cherry Bank. They remain in residence to the present day.

While the integrity of this property has been impacted somewhat by the loss of the three historic porches on the front and east side and from the removal of a small rear addition and its replacement with a modern garage, it still retains sufficient integrity, particularly in the survival of its original form and most of its original, elaborate decorative details, to be nominated under Criterion C. As a well-preserved example of the Italianate style in the Clinton vicinity, Cherry Bank is the only known rural example to survive.

The historical development of Main Avenue began in the late nineteenth century along what was then known as the Ridge Road. In the late nineteenth century, a series of rural residences were built on small acreages, such as the 12-acre parcel associated with Cherry Bank, with the houses set back some distance from the road so that they were all situated on the narrow summit of a high interfluvial ridge that runs parallel to Main Avenue in this area. There are at least six houses that share a similar setback to Cherry Bank, although not all of these houses were built in the late nineteenth century. Beyond the setback, there is no discernible planning in the respective designs of these houses or in their landscaping. There is no evidence that this was ever a platted development, although there was obviously some intentional planning in the siting of these small, suburban acreages on the outskirts of Clinton and in the setback of these houses from this early roadway. These parcels were shown as long, linear lots on the 1865 map, with the names of "Smith, Maffet, B. Riddle, J.H., and B.B. Foster" listed as owners of five lots of varying sizes (Thompson and Brother 1865). The "B.B. Foster" was probably Betsy B. Foster, who owned by property on which Cherry Bank was later built. Elijah Buell, founder of the town of Lyon (an early town later absorbed into the city of Clinton), did own at least some of this land in the 1860s and may have played a role in this suburban residential development (Sylvia Cottral, personal communication 1998; Streit n.d.). It can be stated that Cherry Bank was one of the more elaborate homes built in this suburban development and stands as a rural landmark to the present day.

Verbal Boundary Description

Boundary Justification

The boundary of Cherry Bank includes the house and the surrounding yard area on all four sides of the house. The boundary follows existing fencelines on the south, east, and north sides, with the entry drive serving as the west-side boundary. This area historically encompassed the main house yard and most of the former outbuildings, now non-extant to the northeast and northwest of the house. Areas of the property to the north and south are excluded because of the modern construction of a barn to the northeast and the proposed construction of the Clinton-Mill Creek Expressway to the southeast.
