Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Sheldon House is a clapboarded, one-and-a-half-story, four-bay, gambrel-roofed house with a brick center chimney. Built c. 1728, this is the oldest and largest of four one-and-a-half-story gambrel-roofed houses standing along the southern side of Scituate Avenue west of its intersection with Phenix Avenue. The house is set back perpendicular to the road and faces east. South of the house stand a well-head and a horse barn. To the east of the house is the 1804 Sheldon House (not included in this nomination) and to the west are acres of uncultivated fields and overgrown apple and walnut orchards that were once part of a large farm centered around these structures. The family burial ground (Cranston Historical Cemetery #19) is now part of an adjacent house lot to the west.

Two small dormers are set in roof on the front. The windows have mostly eight-over-eight and twelve-over-twelve sash. The window enframements on the north side display vernacular splayed window caps. The simple plank door with two-light transom is set asymmetrically in the facade, which arrangement may indicate that the Sheldon House began as a half-house. A summer kitchen, probably early-to-mid-eighteenth century, is attached to the southern end of the main house.

The door opens into a small entry with a plain, narrow staircase leading up to the attic bedrooms. The prominent brick chimney contains four fireplaces instead of the typical three on the first floor. The chimney is supported by a large stone and brick barrel vault in the cellar.

To the south of the entry is the small south parlor, with a small, shallow fireplace with plain trim. In contrast, the large parlor in the northeast corner of the house has handsome beveled panelling on the entire chimney wall; a classic bolection molding surrounds the fireplace opening. At the north end is a small chamber, now a library; the room had been converted into one large space in the nineteenth century, but the wall has recently been rebuilt. To the west of the little library at the rear of the house was a small buttry, now a bathroom. West of the small parlor is the present kitchen, the former "keeping room," with a broad corner fireplace and simple mantel with two cupboard doors above it. This room has wainscoting and heavy cased corner posts.

To the north of the present kitchen is the dining room. It has handsome raised, beveled paneling covering the chimney breast and a chair rail. The windows in this room have matching panelled interior shutters. The dining room has an unusual closet, perhaps at one time used for wine, faced in stone and closed off by a four-panel door. The large former summer kitchen, now an ell on the south side of the house, has its own end chimney. This room has plain board wainscoting, wide floorboards, and a very simple, wide and tall flat-board mantel topped by a narrow shelf.

The upstairs garret has four rooms. The only room with a fireplace is on the south side; it also has plain board wainscoting. There is a hallway on the north side at the stairs, which gives access to a bathroom across the west and two smaller bedrooms to the north.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Sheldon House is a good intact example of a classic early Rhode Island farmhouse type--the broad one-and-a-half story gambrel from the eighteenth century. Its rural environment and siting--well back from Scituate Avenue, a major east-west road out of Providence in the eighteenth century--still evokes the agricultural experience that characterized the first two centuries of Rhode Island's history and remains a key part of the character of western Cranston to the present.

The Sheldons were large landholders, owning close to 3,000 acres in north central Cranston. By the 1830's there were five family houses on the Sheldon farm, as well as two workshops, a corn crib, chain house and smoke house, all the typical accoutrements of farming in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The Sheldon wealth is reflected in the construction and detailing of the house. Very likely built as a half-house, the building was probably enlarged in 1764, when Nicholas Sheldon III inherited the property. The more elaborate detailing of the northern half of the house reflects both later architectural style and the increased prosperity of the family. Despite being the earliest of the four remaining gambrel-roofed houses left standing along Scituate Road, its size and detailing--with raised paneling and wainscoting--is much more substantial than the others'.

The house stayed within the family until the mid-nineteenth century. As land was sold off, including the lot west of the house with the family burial ground, deeds show that access was to be granted to all descendants of Nicholas Sheldon to "reach and enter" the burial ground; however, that right includes the obligation to "close all gates and bars behind them".

The property is also associated with another well-known Rhode Island family. The Gladdings who owned Gladding's Department store in downtown Providence acquired the house in 1891.

Period of Significance: The Sheldon House is nominated for its architectural significance, that is, for its ability to document the forms and details used in the domestic buildings of Rhode Island's eighteenth-century substantial farmers. The period of significance therefore corresponds to the house's dates of construction. Internal evidence and local tradition both suggest that the original section of the house was built c. 1728; internal evidence and family history suggest that the significant addition occurred in 1764. Hence, the periods of significance are defined as c. 1728 and 1764.
