This state wayside includes a replica community house and an array of thirteen totem poles carved in Haida and Tlingit styles. Location is that of a traditional Indian campsite.

The house represents early nineteenth century aboriginal chieftains' dwellings; the low oval entrance is typical, but a carved column against the house front is a more recent innovation. The facade with stylized raven is unusual. Only a few buildings were so decorated. A man, wearing a spruce root hat with crest design, sits with cane in hand on each front corner post.

Inside is one large room with a central square firepit, around which is a planked platform that would have served as living quarters for several families, each allotted its own space but sharing the common fire. Three carved houseposts at the east end are part of the essential supporting structure.

Thirteen poles are on the site. Only one, a halibut perched horizontally atop a bare pole, is an old original. Charles Brown, of Saxman, designed and carved the houseposts, facade, entry pole (Wandering Raven), and the pole on the point in front of the house. John Wallace, of Hydaburg, created the Master Carpenter and Man Captured by Otters poles. Others (Sea Monster, Howkan Eagle, Black Fish, Raven at the Head of the Nass, Kats Bear Wife, Thunderers, and Thunderbird-Whale monuments) are copies of originals.

This replica of a nineteenth century aboriginal community house and its accompanying totem art provide, in situ, an excellent opportunity for interpretation of period social customs, technology, and art. It is one of three such structures in existence.

Almost Romanesque in bulk, massive beams and members of the dwelling give indication of a highly sophisticated indigenous culture, adept in building skills and aesthetic representation of folkways.

Although the thirteen poles are predominately copies of nineteenth century originals, they are important both as reflections of an earlier era's art and of styles of the best carvers of the 1940 period. In addition to intrinsic value, the totem poles in combination with the community house and natural setting convey an aura appropriate to historic record of Southeast Alaska Indian society, technology and art.
