DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Hitchcock-Roberts House, a brick building in Monticello with some elements of the Georgian style, was built in 1816 by William Hitchcock, an early settler.

The thirteen inch thick American bond brick walls and chimney are all that remain of the house exterior as constructed by William Hitchcock. Added to the small rectangular structure later in the nineteenth century was a shed room and a front porch. This porch was subsequently removed in 1969 by the present owner who placed in its stead a concrete stoop. A plain pediment with fluted pilasters was thought to be originally shingled. But it has long since been replaced by a tin roof. A modified pitched roof was employed to accommodate the pitch of the original roof when the shed room was added. All of the windows are six-over-six, encased in a plain wooden molding. The left front window is a third smaller than its mate to the right of the entrance, which unbalances the otherwise symmetrical facade. There is no known explanation for this; both windows appear to be original. The shed windows as well as the other two in the brick house are of the same dimensions as the larger front window. Weatherboard, painted yellow, covers the exterior walls of the shed rooms and a small stoop serves as the rear porch. The shed rooms rest on a brick foundation, while the earlier house stands on 3--4" oak logs. On either side of the stepped chimney can be found a single window; both are now covered over. A small attic opening, that may have once been a window, is on the wall opposite the chimney. The house is somewhat Georgian in style, but the many alterations have made it difficult to reconstruct the house as it was when first completed.

The original brick structure consisted of a single room and an attic. This room is now divided slightly to the right of the front entrance, making two rooms of unequal size. A stairway to the attic ran from east to west in what is now the smaller room, but it has been removed and the ceiling covered with boards. There is thus no interior access to the attic. When the interior brick was covered with stucco, a Federal mantel, chair rail, and matching window moldings were installed. This is believed to have occurred before 1900, but the exact date is not known. Between the ceiling boards, thin wooden strips have been added to resemble board and batten construction. The beaded ceiling beams have remained intact through these alterations. Over the fireplace the ceiling drops several inches to accommodate a heating box used for the attic. With the addition of the shed room, the east window of the house was boarded up and the original back door became the entrance to the new room. This door is short and made of board and batten. The shed room, now divided in the same manner as the front room, is also of board and batten construction, with stucco applied to the common brick wall. The pine floor is in evidence here, while the brick half of the house has been carpeted. There are four windows in the shed rooms, one set flanking the rear porch and one each on the north and south walls.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Hitchcock-Roberts House is an early nineteenth century example of brick construction. Built originally as a dwelling, it has since been used in whatever ways the owners deemed profitable. Surrounded by the business district of Monticello, it remains, despite its altered condition, a small but important link to the early years of Jasper County.

William Hitchcock, an early settler of Jasper County, bought the land on which the house now stands in 1816 for $150. When he sold this property in 1818 for $1200, the brick house was mentioned in the deed. There is no evidence that Hitchcock ever lived in this house. He dealt extensively in real estate from the early 1800's until his death in 1844, and was considered to possess more wealth than the occupant of the modest brick home would be able to amass. From its beginning, the house was rented out by Hitchcock and before the 1818 sale it was occupied by James Buchanon. Evidently it was the fate of the brick house to remain in the hands of land traders. Its location near the center of Monticello was desirable and as the town grew, the property was sold six times between 1818 and 1825, each transaction marking an increase in value. The land was sold to L. W. Cargile in 1825, but here all mention of it vanishes in the county deeds until 1872 when it is bought from Abraham Smith by J. L. Campbell. By now the building was in the center of commercial Monticello, but was still used as a dwelling. In 1913, D. B. Benton, a local businessman, purchased the property from Campbell. At some point during his ownership the Monticello Library occupied the building, as a 1944 deed refers to this land as the "library lot". In 1944, Jim Natt Walker bought the land from the Benton estate. After his death, his heirs sold the land to W. D. Roberts, a local attorney, who used the building as his office until 1974. The house is now furnished as an office, but is vacant.

During many years when the owner of the house is unknown, a free Black woman, Ann Spear, known as "Aunt Samantha", lived in the house and made her livelihood by operating a bakery in her home. She sold these goods to the townspeople and students at the Monticello Female Institute at a stand near the house on North Warren Street. It is uncertain whether Ann Spear actually owned the land or was merely another tenant.

The Hitchcock-Roberts House is thought to be the oldest standing structure in Monticello, and is certainly the oldest brick building. Situated on valuable commercial land near the Madison-Eatonton crossroads, the house was often sold, probably more for the lot than the dwelling. The house at times appears to have been a liability, but thankfully, it was never destroyed for the sake of business growth. It was surrounded by commercial structures as the town began to grow, but has, despite the many alterations, kept its early nineteenth century character fairly intact. Although in good condition and structurally sound due to the brick construction, it appears to be in danger due to its commercial location and the inevitable deterioration from remaining unoccupied. The present owner has no plans for the utilization of the building.
