The Cedar Creek Grist Mill is a large, rectangular, braced frame building with gable roof and sheathed with vertical board and batten siding. Frame joinery is mortise and tenon with dowels. Two shed extensions appear at the west and east sides. The structure itself sits on a rock outcropping on the north side of Cedar Creek.

The floor joists in the main section of the building are eight inch logs, 26 feet long and let into 12 inch log sills. The north sill rests on the rock outcrop; the south sill was supported originally by nine-inch square hewn timbers some 20 feet long and reached almost to the level of the creek bed. These timbers were replaced at some time by the present iron pipes. The eastern shed exterior is supported by hewn timber fitted into naturally occuring pockets in the rock wall and a reinforced concrete foundation has been added under the west wall of the opposite shed. An upper story or loft exists in the main structure and it and the main floor are fitted with one and one quarter inch thick tongue and groove boards.

The shed on the west end served as a blacksmith shop. The  $14 \times 16$  foot addition is a half story in height, is sheathed with the same material as the main structure and has a square window opening on the creek side. It is roofed with corrugated iron. The  $16 \times 25$  foot shed on the east end is also roofed with corrugated iron but is sheathed only on the creek side, the remaining two sides being left open.

The original water wheel was removed in 1886 and replaced with a turbine to power the milling machinery. A double walled and hooped shaft about three feet in diameter was built extending from the main floor to the creek bed; a flume was let into the top of the shaft. The flume was 80 feet long and brought water from a log dam across the creek.

Aside from the removal of the wheel and the conversion to turbine, the mill appears little altered since its construction. The roof was originally cedar shakes rather than metal and the stones and other milling equipment are no longer in the building. Various attempts to improve the structural strength of the building are apparant including the addition of various wood and iron supports as well as heavy chains around the members and staked to the rock outcrop. The building itself has suffered from vandalism and neglect although a local historical society resheathed the mill some years ago and also rebuilt about 50 feet of the flume. The last remains of the dam which supplied water to the mill disappeared in the early 1950's.

The Cedar Creek Grist Mill was built in 1876 by the George W. Woodham family and A.C. Reid. Sawn board and timber were cut in Reid's sawmill one half mile downstream from the mill site. In 1886, the water wheel was replaced with a turbine to power the milling machinery.

Although the milling machinery has been removed and the building itself is altered, it still represents an important segment of the agricultural industry. The local mill provided a necessary service to farmers and merchants; during rainy weather, residents of nearby Woodland were willing to spend a full day traveling to and from the Cedar Creek Mill to have their grain milled. The structure itself is unusual in that relatively few buildings in Washington are of braced frame construction. It represents, too, the importance of water power in the early years of settlement; without an abundant and rapidly flowing source of water, many saw and grist mills would have gone unfounded and therefore delaying the progress and altering the pattern of settlement. The Cedar Creek Grist Mill is a rare survivor of that early period.
