Description of present and historic physical appearance:

The Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House is located off of Georgia Highway 9 south of downtown Dawsonville, the county seat of Dawson County, in the foothills of the northeast Georgia mountains. Georgia Highway 9 is a main thoroughfare that runs from Lumpkin County through Dawson County and south to Atlanta in Fulton County. Highway 9 was a main road from northeast Georgia to Atlanta before the construction of Georgia 400.

Built in 1929, the Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House is a one-and-one-half-story, frame, Craftsman bungalow (photographs 1 and 2). The house is a side-gable bungalow type with a projecting front-gable roof over the porch and a front-gable dormer (photograph 3). The original weatherboard siding covers the house and the house rests on a poured-concrete foundation (photographs 6 and 7). There is one external chimney on the right (north) side of the house and two internal chimneys at the rear of the house. Historic lightning rods remain on the roof. Craftsman-style details on the exterior of the house include wide, overhanging eaves, knee braces, and exposed rafters (photographs 4 and 7). Paired Craftsman-style windows and wood-and-glass doors are also significant stylistic features of the house (photographs 5, 8, and 10).

The house has a full-width porch, which extends into a porte cochere (photographs 3 and 9). The porch has a large projecting front-gable roof, knee braces, and a tripartite gable window. The porch is supported by thick brick piers that are topped by marble caps (photographs 10 and 11). The front dormer also has exposed rafters, wide eaves, knee braces, and a tripartite window.

Section 7--Description

The interior of the house retains its original open floor plan that is typical of the bungalow house type. Original wood floors and ceilings, wood window and door surrounds, and wood-paneled doors remain in the house (photographs 13 and 16). Modern carpet covers some of the wood floors. The primary rooms have plaster walls, while the rear rooms and half-story rooms have wood walls. Fireplaces in the house have decorative brickwork and simple mantels (photographs 13, 19, and 21). The front door opens into the large front room (living room), which has French doors leading into the dining room (photograph 13) and a door with a transom above leading into the small hallway (photograph 14). The dining room has low wainscoting and a chair rail (photograph 15). The hall and rear rooms have wood walls and ceilings (photographs 17-21). The kitchen has a modern tile floor and updated appliances and fixtures (photographs 19 and 20). The wood staircase rises to the half-story from the rear of the hall and has thin, square, triple balusters on each step and a decorative newel post (photograph 18).

The half-story has two bedrooms with closets. The front right bedroom has a small fireplace with decorative brickwork (photograph 22). Inside the closet in the right bedroom there is a secret passageway into a hidden room with no exterior windows or doors where Boyd Gilleland had a moonshine still (photograph 23). The original walls are covered with modern sheetrock but the original wood floor remains in this room. The chimney used in the kitchen below rises through this room and was used for ventilation for the still (photograph 24). An additional opening for a stovepipe is seen near the top of the chimney. There is also a removable wall panel in the secret room that leads into the attic space, reputedly as an escape door (photograph 26). There are additional hidden storage spaces and passageways in the half story (photograph 25 and 28). Local legend says the moonshine recipe was removed from the wall of the secret room when the house was sold out of the family.

In 1983, bathrooms and the kitchen were updated. In 1990, a small closet was converted into a half bath and closets were added to a bedroom (photograph 17). In 2005-2006, the house was rehabilitated for use as a special events facility called Peach Brandy Cottage. The laundry room was converted into a handicap-accessible bathroom and a rear porch and steps were added.

The landscaping around the house is mature hardwood trees and ornamental plantings. There is a modern wide, circular drive, landscaped planting beds, wood slat fences, and small rear deck that were added to the property for its current use as a special events facility (photographs 1, 2, 5, and 7). The National Register boundary is approximately 0.4 acres, directly around the house, and does not include a large modern barn and outdoor special events area (photographs 29 and 30).

The rehabilitation of the Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House was approved by the Historic Preservation Division of the Georgia Department of Natural Resources for the state preferential property tax assessment program on December 20, 2007.

Statement of significance (areas of significance)

The Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House was built in 1929-1930 for Boyd Gilleland (1891-1960), his wife Sallie Orr Gilleland (1893-1977), and their five children. Boyd Gilleland had various jobs over the years, primarily carpentry and farming. As a young man, Gilleland worked at a sawmill and did some gold mining. To further supplement his income during the 1930s, Boyd Gilleland made moonshine. Rather than maintaining a still deep in the woods, Gilleland built a secret attic room in the Gilleland house for his still. The location of the house on Georgia Highway 9 in Dawsonville, a highway that goes straight to Atlanta and turns into Peachtree Street, enabled easy transportation and commerce of moonshine to customers and clubs in Atlanta. The success of his moonshine enterprise allowed Boyd Gilleland to develop several businesses in Dawsonville for his children later in life including a service station, hardware store, and Amicalola Lodge. Boyd Gilleland was one of the founders of Dawson County Bank, and in his later years, served as a tax commissioner for Dawson County. After her husband's death in 1960, Sallie Gilleland continued to live in the house until her death in 1977. The house was purchased by the current owners in 1983.

The Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House is significant in the area of architecture as a good and intact example of an early 20th-century Craftsman bungalow in Dawson County. According to Georgia's Living Places: Historic Houses in Their Landscaped Settings, Craftsman-style bungalows were very popular throughout the state and were built from the 1910s through the 1930s. In an analysis of Georgia's Historic Resources Survey (available online at <https://www.itos.uga.edu/nahrgis>), the bungalow is by far the most common house type in Georgia comprising 26% of surveyed houses, and half of the surveyed bungalows have Craftsman-style features. In general, bungalows are concentrated in larger towns and cities in Georgia, particularly in early 20th-century suburbs. In rural areas of the state, Craftsman bungalows are generally located in the upper Piedmont region in a line from LaGrange to Elberton and in a cluster in extreme northwest Georgia. There are far fewer Craftsman bungalows in the southern edge of the Georgia mountain region, which includes Dawson County. The Gilleland house is a relatively rare example of a Craftsman-style bungalow in this part of Georgia. The Gilleland house is also significant as an excellent example of a side-gable bungalow that retains its open bungalow floor plan and exterior and interior character-defining features. Craftsman-style character-defining exterior details include wide, overhanging eaves, exposed knee braces, and Craftsman-style doors and paired windows. The house also retains its original interior character-defining features such as wood door and window surrounds, wood doors, decorative brick fireplaces, and wood floors and ceilings.

The Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House is significant in the area of commerce for its direct association with the production of moonshine in north Georgia during Prohibition. Moonshine production was a popular enterprise in north Georgia counties during Prohibition and into the 1940s (Georgia outlawed the manufacture and consumption of alcohol in 1907 before the Volstead Act of 1920). In Dawson County, millions of gallons of illicit whiskey were brought into Atlanta, often in specially designed "tanker cars" outfitted with secret storage compartments to evade federal revenueurs. Locally, it is well known that Boyd Gilleland made moonshine in his house during Prohibition. The house is located on Georgia Highway 9, which provided direct access to clubs and speakeasies in Atlanta. Architecturally, the house has a secret room that is only accessed through a hidden panel in a closet. The chimney in this room has an extra round vent for a stovepipe, and there is another secret panel leading into a hidden passageway inside the attic space. The manufacture and sale of moonshine allowed north Georgia farmers to supplement their income, particularly during and after the Great Depression. By evading federal taxes on the sale of alcohol, moonshiners were always under the threat of arrest by federal revenue agents—either by stills being found or by being caught transporting moonshine. Stills were often hidden deep in the north Georgia mountains, under camouflage, or within barns. In the case of the Gilleland house, the still was hidden within the house, and reportedly moonshine was made upstairs while Sallie Gilleland cooked dinner downstairs to mask the smoke and odor of distilling alcohol.

National Register Criteria

The Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House meets National Register Criterion A in the area of commerce for its direct association with the production and sale of moonshine in Dawson County by Boyd Gilleland. The house meets National Register Criterion C in the area of architecture as a good, intact example of an early 20th-century Craftsman-style bungalow in Georgia, especially in Dawson County.

Criteria Considerations (if applicable)

N/A

Period of significance (justification)

The period of significance begins with 1929, the year construction began on the house and ends with 1959, the end of the historic period, because Boyd and Sallie Gilleland continued to live in the house until her death in June 1977. Due to the illicit nature of his moonshine operation, it is uncertain when Boyd Gilleland ceased making moonshine at the house. Family tradition is that moonshine was only made in the house during Prohibition. The period of significance ends in 1959 to account for the existence of the secret room throughout the Gillelands ownership of the house.

Developmental history/historic context (if appropriate)

NOTE: The following developmental history was prepared by Caroline Christie, property owner, and with additional research by Gretchen Brock, National Register Coordinator, Historic Preservation Division, Historic Preservation, Inc., "Boyd and Sallie Gilleland House," Historic Property Information Form, January 10, 2007. On file at the Historic Preservation Division, Georgia Department of Natural Resources, Atlanta, Georgia.

Dawson County was named for Judge William Crosby Dawson, who was a Georgia state representative from 1836 to 1841, and served in the U.S. Senate from 1849 to 1856. The county seat, Dawsonville, was incorporated in 1859. Dawson County's economy was based on agriculture with some small-scale gold mining in the early 1800s. Throughout the early 20th-century, during Prohibition, and into the 1940s, Dawson County was also well known for the manufacture of moonshine, apple brandy, and peach brandy. Dawsonville is known as one of the birthplaces of NASCAR with many local men with ties to bootlegging, such as Raymond Parks, Roy Hall, and Lloyd Seay, having successful careers early in the history of the sport. Today, Dawsonville is famous for its NASCAR drivers, the local Dawsonville Pool Room with its collection of NASCAR memorabilia, and its annual Mountain Moonshine Festival in October.

Boyd Nathaniel Gilleland was born on April 9, 1891. He married Sallie E. Orr on October 10, 1910. In the 1920 U.S. Census, Boyd Gilleland is listed as a farmer. His obituary mentions that he was known in the community as a farmer and a fine carpenter. The Gillelands lived in the Emma community of Dawson County with their five children until 1929 when Boyd moved his family into their new house off of Georgia Highway 9 in Dawsonville in Dawson County. The Gillelands owned 100 acres of land at their new house site and Boyd was listed as a farmer in the 1930 U.S. Census.

A number of north Georgia farms started making and selling moonshine with the start of Prohibition in 1920. The typical method was to site the still in an isolated area, but the fire and odor of the distilling mash often resulted in the arrest of the moonshiner. Boyd Gilleland decided to build an indoor moonshine still.

The Craftsman-style house he built has an attic area over this kitchen, with the kitchen chimney going through the attic to the roof. Boyd made some small modifications to the house plans, including a secret passageway from an upstairs bedroom closet. The secret passageway went behind the hall closet and the upstairs bathroom into a secret attic room, which had no windows or doors. He also added another secret passageway behind and beside the small upstairs bedroom, which gave him an opportunity to escape from the secret room should lawmen get into the house and discover the secret room.

The Gilleland children were unaware of their family enterprise. Pete Gilleland says that he was nine years old when he first learned of the existence of the secret room. He was taking a nap and his father carried him into the room. When Pete woke up, he did not know where he was. According to Pete, the family only made moonshine for a few years.

Section 8--Statement of Significance

Dawsonville is well known for its connection to moonshine. Millions of gallons of illicit whiskey made in Dawson County were brought into Atlanta, often in specially designed "tanker cars" outfitted with secret storage compartments to evade federal revenueurs. By evading federal taxes on the sale of alcohol, moonshiners were always under the threat of arrest by federal revenue agents either by stills being found or by being caught transporting moonshine. Stills were often hidden deep in the north Georgia mountains, under camouflage, or within barns. Transporting illegal liquor from the mountains to larger cities had its own set of dangers. Mountain roads were often poorly maintained with treacherous curves, and moonshine "runners" often had to outrun "revenueurs" in their cars. North Georgia moonshiners became famous (or infamous) for their fast cars, often 1940 Fords, that were "souped up" by mechanics to go over 100 miles per hour to outrun revenue agents and local law enforcement. The cars were further modified with heavy-duty suspensions, rear and passenger seats were removed for extra storage space, and metal plates were installed in front of radiators to prevent police from shooting holes in them. On the weekends, runners or bootleggers would gather together to determine who had the fastest car or who was the best driver. These impromptu races became popular spectator events in mountain communities of Georgia, Tennessee, and the Carolinas. By the late 1940s, the north Georgia tradition of running moonshine and outrunning revenueurs in fast, powerful cars grew into the popular sport of stock car racing (NASCAR--National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing). Many of NASCAR's legendary drivers, such as Bill Elliott (a.k.a. Awesome Bill from Dawsonville), grew up in Dawson and neighboring Georgia counties.

Boyd Gilleland used his success in the moonshine business to start legal businesses for his children. He built Amicalola Lodge for his son Pete, the Dawsonville Service Station for his son Gene, and the Dawsonville Hardware for his son Carlton. In addition, Boyd was one of the five founders of the Dawson County Bank and was elected tax commissioner for Dawson County. In 1952, Dawsonville received local telephone service and Boyd Gilleland was among Standard Telephone Company's first 25 customers to subscribe. According to his obituary, Boyd was a respected and well-loved resident of Dawsonville. He died on March 2, 1960. Sallie Gilleland continued to live in the house until her death on June 25, 1977.

10. Geographical Data

Acreage of Property      Less than one acre.

UTM References

A)    Zone 16      Easting 764757      Northing 3811839

Verbal Boundary Description

The National Register boundary is indicated on the attached plat map drawn to scale with a heavy, black line.

Boundary Justification

The nominated property consists of a rectangular tract of land measuring approximately 160 feet east-west and 115 north-south.

The northern boundary runs along the northern legal boundary of the property for approximately 160 feet from Georgia Highway 9 on the east to a wooden fence at the back of the lawn on the west.

The western boundary runs approximately 110 feet along a wooden fence at the west edge of the back lawn separating the yard from a parking area further west.

The southern boundary runs for approximately 160 feet along the northern edge of a dirt driveway nearly adjacent to the house.

The eastern boundary follows the western edge of the right-of-way Georgia Highway 9 except for a small incursion into the right of way at the northeastern corner of the nominated property to include a small grassed area and a historic tree.
