The O'Reilly House is 40'9" x 30'2½" horizontally, and 31'0" vertically from finish grade to ridge line. It has two stories plus a large attic. It was probably enlarged during the British occupancy (1763/83) since chimneys were unknown in the houses of the first Spanish period (1565-1763).

Both the ground and second floors each consist of three rooms and a stair hall. The exterior walls and interior ground floor partitions are well constructed of coquina stone. The center wall, ground floor, east side, is made of "tabby," and is probably part of an earlier, smaller house, before the use of coquina in the 1700's.

There is a single chimney of coquina on the west exterior wall. This chimney admits fireplaces into its east face on both the ground and second story levels.

There are five entrances on the ground floor: two on the north, two on the east and one on the south. The eastern portion of the house consists of a large room on the northeast and the stair hall on the south-east. The western portion consists of a small room on the south-west and one other room on the north-west. There is a fireplace on the west wall of the latter.

On the second floor there is a single large room across the east end of the house. The west end of the house consists of a small room on the south-west and a larger room on the north-west. The stair hall lies between the south-west and the east end rooms. A portion of the east end of the stair hall is partitioned off and contains another stairway which leads up to the attic. The second story fireplace is on the west wall of the north-west room.

The flooring on the ground floor is  $4\frac{1}{2}$ " x  $4\frac{1}{2}$ " ceramic tile, red and black alternating in a checkerboard pattern on the edges, and a Spanish tile design in the center. The flooring on the second floor is pine planking laid in a running pattern.

There is a single cantilevered, roofed balcony running the length of the east facade at the second story level.

The roof is a gable with a ridge running east and west. The roofs of both the house and the balcony are covered with asbestos cement shingles. Eaves extend about one foot and are terminated by a square edged wood fascia.

The present O'Reilly House was extensively repaired in the mid 1940's. (It was not "reconstructed" in the sense of being (con't.)

torn down and put up from old plans). In the 1940's the new tile floors were laid; the (cypress) ceilings were replaced; plumbing and electrical systems were installed; roofing was replaced; the coquina in the fireplace and chimney was rebuilt; the balconies were reconstructed. The exterior woodwork was replaced while the interior wood remains the same. The coquina walls, though repaird, are the original walls; the flooring in the attic, ceiling beams and wood in attic partitions are all the original wood. The interior doors are originals, repaired. Window glass and interior wood of doors and windows are all old materials. Some hardware on doors was brought from England in the 1940's and is of the same period as the house.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The O'Reilly House is significant historically because its present architecture reveals at least two different historical and cultural periods; it seems to manifest eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth century architectural features, indicating that it was altered and enlarged at different periods. The last basic change was the addition of the fireplace, probably during the English occupation. Work on the house since has been to repair and restore, not reconstruct or alter. The presence of a tabby wall, now an interior partition, is significant of very early construction. The use of coquina blocks in the second floor exterior walls, and also to join the roof ridge at the east and west ends, indicates extensive enlargement after the first Spanish period.

The house has significance in the history of the Roman Catholic Church. The property was willed by Don Miquel O'Rei/lly to the Church authorities "in trust" for a future religious Community in the tradition of St. Francis de Sales. And it was only when Bishop Verot introduced into the Diocese of St. Augustine members of the Sisters of St. Joseph from their place of origin in Le Puy, France, that there was in St. Augustine a religious Community founded on the plan of St. Francis de Sales. The building was first used by Church authorities as the Catholic Rectory--home of the Pastor of the parish church of St. Augustine. Here were held many conferences with Spanish authorities during the construction of the present Cathedral of St. Augustine, now an historical monument. 1867 the building was the dwelling of the Sisters of St. Joseph when they were opening their free schools for negro children, on this same property. It was used in the following years for school purposes in the development of the St. Augustine Catholic schools. Today, as a museum of the Sisters of St. Joseph, it houses many objects given from the houses of early St. Augustine citizens as well as collections representing the Church and the religious Community.

The house has social and cultural significance for the City of St. Augustine. The St. Augustine Historical Society lists it among the ten oldest houses, and it is mentioned and shown in the city's earliest records and maps. The Historical Society has set its factual date at 1763 and its probable date at 1690. The familes who resided in the house can be traced from the first Spanish period, the British period, and the second Spanish period. Even for the first known family (Don Lorenzo Josef de Leon, 1763) church records of marriage and Baptisms are still in existence, along with a great deal of personal biographical data.
