The Sandy Point Farm House is an excellent example of the residence of a relatively affluent Maryland farmer in the first quarter of the 19th century... The house and outbuildings are worthy of preservation as an example of the country architecture of the 19th century.<sup>1</sup>

The house also exemplifies several characteristics of Maryland architecture. Its five part plan-one central block with a pair of wings, each connected to the main house by hyphens--occurs often in 18th century southern Maryland architecture. The tower on the northern facade is a feature occasionally found on Maryland 17th century-style buildings, an example being the Statehouse at St. Mary's City. The prototype of the tower lies in English medieval architecture. These two architectural forms, the five-part plan and the tower, are found, although on a more imposing scale, at the William Paca House in Annapolis. The fact that the Sandy Point Farm House was built in an 18th century style in the nineteenth century--making it a "hold-over"--is also typical of Maryland domestic architecture.

The owner of the farm at Sandy Point prior to Henry Mayer was John Gibson, a relative by marriage of the mid-18th century Maryland governor, Samuel Ogle; and a business associate of Charles Carroll of Carrollton. Carroll, in fact, held a mortgage on the property during the Gibson ownership. No records have been located to indicate if Gibson maintained (c.1816) a farm at Sandy Point, although he resided elsewhere.<sup>2</sup> The first clear evidence of the existence of the Sandy Point Farm House appears in the records of settlement of Henry Mayer's estat estate (1833).<sup>3</sup>

The first-quarter-nineteenth-century farmer who lived at Sandy Point was Henry E. Mayer ( -1831). At his death, Mayer left the Farm House, a barn, Negro slave quarters, seventeen slaves, a carriage house, a stable, a wooden granary, and a personal inventory worth $4,173.90 1/4.<sup>4</sup> Mayer's executor sold
