Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Drohman cabin is a one and one-half story building, standing alone on a small rise in the middle of what is now the Yahara Hills Golf Course. Originally a dwelling, the building has not become altogether anomalous in its surroundings, because of the recurring growth of high grasses immediately around it. Currently, the cabin is sheathed in late-nineteenth century board and batten siding on the outside and modern lath and plaster on the inside. On the exterior of the east wall and the interior of the south wall the sheathings have fallen away, revealing the two-story shaped log principle portion of the structure, and the small one-story tan brick and half-timber rear portion with its wattle-and-daub interior structure.

The front facade is spanned by an open porch of simple square columns and remnants of a jig-saw-cut valence, supporting the extended gable roof. At the time that the porch was added (probably in the late nineteenth century), a triangular gable was added in the center of the roof over the front facade. More recent red brick infill over the side wall of the rear extension indicates that the rear slope of the roof was altered to its saltbox form at the time that the board-and-batten veneer was applied, probably also in the late nineteenth century. The entire roof, with its front and rear extensions, is now covered with asphalt shingles. One red brick chimney rises from the western half of the rear extension, which lacks the wattle-and-daub interior finish and may well have been added at a later date. (A small closed "vestibule" added in the center of the rear extension conceals any evidence of a scar.) A tall exterior chimney, of concrete block, rises along the east wall. Openings throughout are rectangular, enclosed by wood frames and covered by plywood panels where they have not been disturbed. A flight of steps serves the wood door in the cellar on the west wall.

The logs in the two-story portion are handhewn oak, laid horizontally in the manner of the German immigrants, who left spaces between the logs for chinking of mortar and boards. The corners are joined with dovetailed notches, also a typically German technique. The logs are in excellent condition despite their age (more than 125 years) due to the board-and-batten veneer. The timbers that are exposed in the basement area and interior wall of the first floor show little sign of rot.

The only structural problems with the building appear to be the disturbance of the wattle and daub construction in the south wall, a missing section of the back wall of the main log portion of the dwelling, a missing porch column, and loss of jigsaw valences, and a leaking roof.

Aside from the visible portion of wattle-and-daub structure on the south wall and shaped logs on the south wall of the rear extension, little evidence of the original form of the interior remains. Generations of crumbling plaster-and-lath and wall paper (probably from the 1920s and 1940s) cover the walls. Panelled wood doors of late nineteenth-century vintage divide the front portion and rear extension into two rooms each; a hall and stairway fill the center (actually the rear of the two-story portion) of the plan. A wood door with three ascending rectangular lights (typical of the early 1950s) covers the front entrance. Buckling linoleum covers the floors. Deterioration and water damage, although not serious, are considerable.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The George Drohman Cabin is architecturally significant as a rare representative of a type of ethnic construction. The small cabin is one of few known extant examples of German-type shaped log, half-timber, and wattle-and-daub construction in the state.

Constructed in mid-nineteenth-century "frontier" Madison on land granted by the United States during Wisconsin's year of admission to the Union,<sup>2</sup> the nominated structure, in its isolation on the Yahara Hills Golf Course, is one of few "pioneer" structures in Wisconsin whose site retains some of its historical character. Tax records of 1851 show German<sup>3</sup> immigrant George Drohman as "resident owner" of eighty acres of land in the Town of Blooming Grove, east of the capital village of Madison. Nothing is known about Drohman's specific region of origin or whereabouts after he failed to appear in the 1860 state census. According to State Historical Society of Wisconsin staff at Old World Wisconsin, the state's outdoor ethnic museum, the Drohman Cabin is one of only three known examples of wattle-and-daub construction in the state.<sup>4</sup> The technique, consisting of branches woven through wood members and plastered with a mixture of clay and straw, was used extensively in northern European construction, and by German and Danish immigrants to Wisconsin in the nineteenth century. In addition to the significance of the wattle-and-daub alone, the survival of a shaped log building with German-type half-timber extension on its original site on the outskirts of an urban area is exceptional.

The abstract of title to the original Drohman property showed a transfer of to Adolph Siggelkow in 1851; possession passed from the Siggelkow heirs to Charles Beckman in 1890. The house and property remained in private hands until the early 1960s when the City of Madison acquired the land. The cabin now sits at the top of a rise surrounded by an island of vegetation on the Yahara Hills Golf Course, owned and operated by the City. In its present protective ownership, it may be that the educational potential of the Drohman Cabin could be realized.

<sup>4</sup> March 31, 1981 interview with Mark Knipping and Alan Pape, Old World Wisconsin, Eagle, WI, by Jacquelyn Star of Madison. Architectural Historian Richard W. E. Perrin, in a letter of March 27, 1981 to Diane Filipowicz of the State Historical Society, recommended Pape as knowledgeable about wattle-and-daub construction. That letter, and transcript of the subsequent interview, are on file in the Historic Preservation Division, State Historical Society of Wisconsin.
