Located in a small open area, designated Washington Square, near the intersection of Broadand Meeting Streets. Its nearest neighbors are St. Michael's Church, the United States Post Office, the County Court House, and the City Hall. Its architect, Robert Mills (1781-1855) said of it in 1826:

"It is designed in the simple Greek Doric style, without any ornament, except that afforded by the portices which face each front. These portices are composed of four massy columns, three and a half feet in diameter, raised on an arcade, the columns rise the whole height of the building (comprising two stories) surmounted by their entablature and crowned by a pediment, which extending entirely across the building, meet together in the middle; the remaining part of the building, on each side constitute wings to the center, falling below the apex of the pediment; the front of these offices is 66 feet; and the breath 46 feet, besides the portices, which project about 12, and extend in front 33 feet each. They are communicated with from the street by adouble flight of stone steps at both ends. The basement portices, cornice, etc. are of stone. The walls are of brick, stucced in imitation of the same.

"The rooms for offices are vaulted in brick, and the roof covered with copper so as to render the building secure from fire. As a further guard the sashes and frames are all of iron with the shutters.

"Each front presents two doors of entrance which lead into corridors communicating with the several offices. The number of distinct apartments in the several stories includes twenty-four, besides the staircase and the passages.

"The interior stair-steps are of stone, rising from the basement story to the third floor and lighted by a skylight."

The principal alterations are: the exterior staircases changed from curved to angled; the roof, which was stolen after the Civil War, has been replaced with tin; the pediments over the colonnades were changed after the earthquake; fireplaces have, for the greater part, been closed.

The present plans for renovation include climate control, improved lighting and plumbing, new and improved equipment for conservation of the collections, and repainting of the interior.

The exterior was waterproofed by the County in 1961, and the roof recently completely renewed.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

Designed by Robert Mills in 1822 and built for the purpose of housing state records safely. It is believed to be the first building of fire-proof construction in the United States. It is presently the home of the South Carolina Historical Society.

After 1865 the building was used for County Offices, when State records were concentrated in Columbia. In 1943, the County vacated the second and third floors which were then leased to the South Carolina Historical Society; the County reserved the use of the first (basement) floor until 1969.

William H. Pierson, Jr., Williams College, reports that Robert Mills incorporated some of the plans he had used in designing the Fireproof Building when he designed the new U. S. Treasury Building.
