McCroskey, John, House
Monroe County, Tennessee

DESCRIPTION

The John McCroskey House is a two story massed plan brick dwelling completed in 1857 by the first sheriff of Monroe County. The house has a limestone foundation, walls of hand-made brick laid up in six-course common bond, and a hipped roof. The front porch appears to be a late-nineteenth century addition. The interior retains its original central hall plan and several of the original fireplaces. There are two symmetrically placed interior brick chimneys. The house is located in northwestern Monroe County, east of the town of Sweetwater (pop. 5,066) on a rural county highway and is surrounded by rolling farmland. The immediate yard is approximately one acre and fenced on three sides. The entire property encompasses 56 acres. The boundaries of this nomination have been drawn to include the house and the associated McCroskey family cemetery.

The primary (northwest) elevation has three bays composed of two windows and a centered entrance. The entrance consists of a full-length beveled glass and wood doors surrounded by multi-light sidelights and a transom. The original six-over-six wood sash windows have louvered wood shutters which, if not original, date to the late nineteenth century. There is another centered entry in the second story. This second story entry is composed of one set of French doors and three-light sidelights. Second story windows are also six-over-six wood sashes.

A full-width porch extends across the primary elevation and appears to have been added in the late nineteenth century, most likely by Henry Montgomery McCroskey. The original wood floor rotted and was replaced with a smooth concrete floor circa 1970. The hipped porch roof is supported by turned columns. The rail and frieze of the porch are also turned wood. Concrete steps lead from the porch to a brick walk that has become overgrown with grass. Moderately sized bushes grow at the foundation of the porch.

The northeast elevation is symmetrical with two bays of six-over-six double-hung wood windows on each story. The windows have shutters that match those on the primary elevation. A one story rear kitchen addition is visible from this view.

The southeast, or rear, elevation is three bays wide and contains three small one-story additions. The first addition is a small kitchen constructed of brick circa 1900 and located on the south corner, extending approximately halfway across the elevation. The original kitchen was located apart from the house and was demolished when the addition was constructed. There is a wood door in the rear wall of the kitchen and a six-over-six window in the southwest wall. A circa 1950 shed roof overhangs the door. A garage addition of wood construction was added to the east corner circa 1970. A connecting section of wood construction with a glass block insert is located between the other two additions. This section appears to have been added between 1930 and 1950. There are only two six-over-six windows in the upper story and they do not have shutters.

The southwest elevation is identical to the northeast elevation.

The interior of the John McCroskey House is a central hall plan with one modification: a foyer was constructed in the front section of the hall and separated from the stairs by a large wood and glass door. It is difficult to ascertain whether this foyer is original to the house, or whether it was added later. The house is two rooms deep, making four rooms in the original section. Each room has a fireplace and built-in cabinetry. There are three additions to the rear of the house containing a garage, a bathroom, and a kitchen with a butler's pantry. Many of the rooms contain nineteenth and early twentieth century light fixtures.

The west parlor contains an original wood mantel and a built-in cabinet in the east corner. The cabinet has shelves above a closed cupboard with paneled doors. In the south corner is an arched doorway leading to the south parlor. The south parlor also has a fireplace with a built-in cabinet in the north corner. A doorway has been cut into the southeast wall of the parlor and leads into the kitchen. When the current owners purchased the house, the kitchen addition was found to have severe termite and dry-rot damage. They replaced the original floor and decking, as well as the cabinets and appliances. The room has also been wired to comply with modern electrical codes. The east parlor has a centered fireplace and a built-in closet. There is a connecting paneled wood door leading to the north parlor that has a fireplace, built-in cabinet, and a built-in closet.

A staircase with turned balusters is located along the northeast wall of the central hall. Carpeting has been removed from the stairs and the original wood surface has been revealed. The upstairs rooms are arranged identically to those on the first floor. A small bathroom was added circa 1950 between the south and west rooms. The upstairs rooms all have fireplaces and built-in closets. The east room has been converted to a large bathroom. There are narrow steps leading to the attic from the central hallway, directly above the primary staircase.

There are three outbuildings associated with the property. The first is a late-nineteenth century farm outbuilding, most likely used to store equipment and vehicles. Located within the fenced yard area, it is 1-1/2 stories and of frame construction. Because its association with the McCroskey family is uncertain, it is considered a noncontributing resource. The second outbuilding is a small shed of frame construction, probably built circa 1960 and used as a workshop. It is non-contributing. The third building is a circa 1960 wood shed with a lean-to addition. This building appears to have been used to store hay and is non-contributing.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The John McCroskey House is significant under Criterion C as an excellent example of a moderate-sized antebellum Greek Revival influenced house in Monroe County. The house was the home of a prominent landowner and the county's first sheriff. The McCroskey family was a notable family throughout most of the nineteenth century and contributed to the early economic and political development of the county. The house retains a high degree of architectural and historical integrity.

Construction of the house by slaves began in 1852 and was completed in 1857. The house has undergone a few changes with the addition of a late-nineteenth century porch and rear kitchen. The interior plan remains basically unchanged and retains such original features as built-in cabinetry in many of the rooms.

The house was one of the larger farms in central Monroe County throughout the nineteenth century. The house exhibits influences of the Greek Revival style, but was remodeled in the 1880s. By that time the house had passed from John McCroskey his son, Henry Montgomery McCroskey, who was a successful merchant. A stylish Victorian era porch was added to the house to give it an updated look.

John McCroskey was born in 1788 in Virginia. His father, John Blair McCroskey, fought in the American Revolution and earned a reputation as an "Indian fighter". According to his pension application, he "volunteered to perform a tour of duty for the protection of the frontier settlements on Clinch River against the hostile Indians..."¹ By 1780, he was in the Carolinas fighting the British and the Tories. John Blair McCroskey was rewarded for his service in the American Revolution with land grants in Greene County in 1788 and 1793. Greene County was at that time a part of North Carolina and made up most of what is now East Tennessee. His fourth son and namesake became one of the earliest settlers of the Hiwassee Purchase, which included the future county of Monroe.

The Hiwassee Purchase included parts of Hamilton, McMinn, and Blount counties, and Monroe County's first seventeen districts. Monroe County was created in 1819 and in 1825 the Tennessee General Assembly established a Register's Office in adjacent McMinn County. The Register recorded land sales in several counties. Monroe County was divided into townships of thirty-six square miles, which in turn divided into thirty-six sections, each one mile square and containing 640 acres. On one section, John McCroskey established the nominated property as his home and called it Glenloch (sometimes spelled Glen Loch).

Monroe County Circuit Court was first held in the home of William Dixon on the first Monday of May, 1820. John McCroskey served as sheriff at that time, was elected to the position in 1822, and served until 1830. McCroskey was a slave holder and apparently went against the rest of his family by supporting the South during the Civil War. He was a Democrat and for forty years an elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

John McCroskey's family was large and active in the social and political development of the county. His nephew, Solon, became a well-known pastor in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Thomas Edmund Houston (T.E.H.) McCroskey, John McCroskey's eleventh child, became an attorney in 1871, after rising to the rank of Colonel in the Confederate Army during the Civil War. He was appointed to various positions and committees within the county and in 1895 was elected to be Ranger. Henry Montgomery McCroskey, the ninth child, enlisted in 1862 and fought with Company D of the 62nd Tennessee Regiment of the Confederate Infantry at Vicksburg. He took over the family homestead upon his father's death in 1866 and married Mary Pearce in 1873. In 1879, he joined in a partnership with A. H. Gallaher (Gallagher?) and established a general merchandise business at Glenloch and later raised Jersey cattle.

Joshua Philander Theodore (J.P.T.) McCroskey was born in Rockville, Monroe County on October 8, 1828 to John McCroskey and his first wife Lucinda Ann Grant McCroskey. His brother Patrick Henry McCroskey, the youngest son from John McCroskey's first marriage, was born in Rockville in 1830. The brothers set off for California in 1852, but Patrick died of cholera on board the steamship Cortez on passage from Panama to San Francisco. He was buried at sea and a monument was erected in his memory in the family cemetery. Stricken with grief, J.P.T. returned home to Glenloch. In 1869, after several years in Tennessee, he traveled to the Oregon Territory (now eastern Washington). J.P.T. and his wife Mary Minerva Gallagher (Gallagher?) settled in Whitman County, Washington. Prominent settlers in Washington, they are credited with attracting approximately 1,000 Tennesseans to Washington State. The region where the McCroskeys and other Tennesseans settled is still known as "Tennessee Flats." J.P.T. McCroskey's Washington State home is remarkably similar to the family's Monroe County home in its symmetrical plan, chimney and window placement, rear additions, and porch. Neither house is a common house form in their respective regions.²

Ownership of the house has passed through several families in the twentieth century. It was known as the Harlan Farm in the early part of this century. John Tate Simpson purchased the house and property including approximately 130 acres from George Harlan in 1918 for $12,758. Texas Powers Roden purchased a smaller section of the property, including the house, for his daughter in the 1940s. McCona George purchased the house and land from Mary Roden in 1953 and lived there until 1996 when the present owners purchased it. According to Louise George, a developer named Arthur Borden owned the house at some point. It was he who tore down the original detached kitchen and added the kitchen addition to the rear of the house. Borden apparently bought and sold many houses in Monroe County, remodeling them as he went. He reportedly sold the house to Mary Roden's father, so it is assumed that if this information is correct, the changes were made in the mid-1940s. There are no deed records of Borden's ownership.

The house exhibits features that, while commonly seen in East Tennessee houses constructed in the 1840s, are excellent examples of carpentry. The built-in wood cabinetry in the rooms is common in many homes, however, is usually found only in one room. The McCroskey House has built-in cabinets and closets in all of its rooms. The French door dividing the entry is an unusual feature of the house and its age has not been determined.
