Blair House was designed and built in 1880-1881 by Iowa architect William Fostery who also designed the county courthouse on the other side of the city square. Built by Winfield, Smouse as a private home and later occupied by the Blair family (1882-1898), Blair House has for a longer period of time served as a community building for social (Commercial Club, 1903-1926) and civic (City Hall, 1926-1972) affairs.

Architecturally, Blair House compliments the dominant nineteenth century character of Washington's city square area.

It was the center of the private social life of Washington in the late 19th century. Taken over by the Commercial Club in 1903, the Blair House remained the center of the community's social life for many years as all the social clubs met in the building. The addition of the hall on the south increased the use of the building by the community. Veterans organizations, rotary, etc., met here for years. Celebrations, dances, and parties are still being held in the south addition known as the Legion Hall.

The use of the house as City Hall since 1926 has also increased the building's importance to the city to the point that no other building in the city is so tied to the social and commercial life of the community.

Because few Victorian homes remain in this area, the Blair House stands as an architectural landmark. The home has been referred to as "little Terrace Hill" due to its similarity to the Terrace Hill Mansion in Des Moines, a National Register of Historic Places site.

(Numerous accounts of activities in the home were published in The Washington Press and the Washington Evening Journal, both local newspapers.)
