DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Watzek house was designed by John Yeon in 1936. He later entered the office of A. E. Doyle (then deceased) for a few months early in 1937 for the preparation of working drawings. Plans and construction were completed in 1937. Supervision of construction, design of gardens, and design of furniture were done by Yeon after leaving the Doyle office.

The extensive use of wood in the house and of native plants in the garden reflected two interests of the owner: lumber, which was his business, and mountaineering, his pleasure. Woods of the region are used for decorative finish as well as for structure. And the garden, outside of the court, is composed entirely of indigenous plants gathered from the wilds.

The design of the house was itself intended to express an allegiance to the regional landscape which had no indigenous style. It admits of many influences; its originality is not strident. It is traditional in its serenity, modern in its use of spare geometric forms including the obliques and triangles of roofs and gables. Yet the house was an abrupt departure from the contemporary fashion for period revivals or the new counter-culture of the International Style. It appeared when there was strong critical interest in regional manifestations of modern art, and was soon widely known through publications and exhibitions as an outstanding example of new regional architecture. It has remained the most pivotal and famous example of modern domestic architecture in the Pacific Northwest.

The plan of the Watzek house provides for occupant and visitor an unfolding sequence of effects which Philip Johnson extolls in recent writing as the processional experience some architecture provides. The approach to the house reveals only reticent blank walls and a single door. Not even the nature of the scenic site is suggested. Through the door one enters an enclosed courtyard with water, flowers, a glimpse of a valley, and the first revelation of the nature of the surrounding house, Passage is controlled past the reflecting pool and under cover to the front door. This door opens into the side of a low narrow hall connecting living and dining rooms and serving also the guest room, library and service wing, There are two axes in the plan which cross at right angles. The first experienced is the entrance hall axis which terminates at the left in the symmetrical dining room with a window wall which panels forest growth and wildflower ground cover like a verdure screen. At the right, the termination is a contrasting solid wall of the living room. Entering this room the space expands and the second axis takes over, terminating at the right in the enclosed court, and at the left through another window wall on Mt, Hood, some fifty miles away over enfolding foreground hills and the Willamette Valley containing Portland. Parallel to this axis is a symbolic mountain-viewing terrace. Concealment, and revealment provide elements of surprise and contrast in the processional sequence through courtyard and rooms to distant mountain views.

The Aubrey R. Watzek House in the west hills overlooking metropolitan Portland is one of the most widely acclaimed examples of modern residential architecture in Oregon. The house was designed by John Yeon, a member of the architectural firm of A. E. Doyle and Associate, and completed in 1937. Gable roofs, single story wings, wood construction, and other forms of the local vernacular tradition combined with an open interior spatial organization make the house one of the influential landmarks in development of a regional domestic style sometimes referred to as the "Northwest Style."

Native Oregonian John B. Yeon joined the firm of A. E. Doyle and Associate early in his career. Through association with the firm's principal, Pietro Belluschi, Yeon sharpened his appreciation of regional qualities. He has received several awards of merit for his work. In 1956 he was awarded the National Institute of Arts and Letters architecture award, the Arnold W. Brunner memorial prize. It was reported at the time that the recognition was for an over-all contribution to the field rather than for a particular Progressive Architecture awarded Yeon special recognition for the design. technically innovative Portland Visitors' Information Center (1949) which Yeon designed in association with Wick, Hilgers, and Scott. Yeon's designs have been published in several foreign-language professional journals, and his works have been included in exhibitions at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. He currently lives in retirement in Portland.

Aubrey R. Watzek was born at Davenport, Iowa, in 1889. Following his graduation from Yale University in 1909 and Harvard Law School in 1913, he settled in Portland, Oregon, where he pursued a long and distinguished business career. The Oregon community came to recognize him as a civic leader, humanitarian and patron of the arts.

After the death of Mr. Watzek in 1973, the house came on the market and was subsequently purchased by John Yeon, the original architect. Mr. Yeon is not living in the house and does not have concrete plans for its future, but states that the house is not for sale. It is being maintained in good condition.
