DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Hoboken City Hall occupies a square block in the heart of downtown Hoboken, fronting on Washington Street. The present building incorporates two phases of construction, the first completed in 1883, the second in 1911.

City Hall of 1883, was designed by Francis George Himpler in Second Empire Style. Its facade is ultimately based on Haussman's redesign of the Tuileries. Two full stories surmounted a high basement, the whole topped by a mansard roof enclosing usable garret space. The facade was divided into five bays. A central pavilion, marked by an arched doorway and window crowned with broken segmental pediments, and culminating in a low mansarded clock tower, was set slightly forward from the main block of the building. At either end were two pavilions each the width of one window. Shallowly recessed between the central and end pavilions were two bays, each three windows in width. These elements were set off from one another by rusticated quoins.

Materials were somber. The basement was of rock-faced ashlar; the upper stories of brick with brownstone trim. Heavy molded brownstone belt courses defined the stories, which were also differentiated by window trim, triangular pediments on the first floor, segmental on the second. The mansard was pierced by rondels with triangular peaks, in the end pavilions, which bore rectangular, pedimented windows.

Behind this facade, the plan was U-shaped, with wings enclosing a courtyard extending to the rear. These wings are still visible, with the lower walls, virtually unaltered, divided into three bays by the device of recessing the central section the thickness of one brick. The decorative detailing of the facade is continued on the first bay; the other two bays and the rear of these wings have simple flat belt courses and plain Italianate window trim. Each of the side facades was pierced by a pedimented door in the rear bay. That on the north side still bears the partially effaced inscription "Police and Recorders Court."

The building of 1911 left the major portions of the 1883 building intact as the core of the new construction. The central doorway and window above remain intact, as does one window of the original building in both stories, on either side of the entrance. This section of the old building was, however, faced with cream-color brick to match the new construction. The major elements of the later are two, two-story, square projecting bays on either side of the entrance; a two-story jail in the courtyard between the arms of the "U"; and conversion of the mansard to a full third story. All of these are executed in cream-color brick with brownstone trim.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Every city and town through the United States contains, at least, one important public building which conducts the official business of its city. In Hoboken, that building is City Hall, located at 86-98 Washington Street.

The village of Hoboken grew slow until, 1784, when Colonel John Stevens founder of Hoboken, bought the property for $90,000. On March 28, 1855. Hoboken was incorporated as a City. By that time the City's political, industrial, commercial and residential growth was substantial and required a City Hall capable of housing the governmental activities.

The land on which the building now stands originally was a Market Place, where people were often found trading rare foreign commodities. Prior to its completion in 1881, official city business was conducted at the old Morton House, 209 Washington Street.

City Hall's significance appears in three major areas: Architecture, Military and Political.

In the area of architecture, City Hall is important because of its monumental facade with classical detailing, typical of civic architecture of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The architect, Francis G. Himpler, was noted for church architecture but also designed many other buildings. He was especially successful in planning the acoustic properties of large structures, invented an improved wooden partition preventing cracks in ceilings and walls. He never worked from plueprints or typed specifications. He also designed Public School Number 4 in Hoboken and Our Lady of Grace Church and Academy of the Sacred Heart Church also in Hoboken.

In the area of military significance, the City Hall had facilities for an armory which was housed on the top floor of the building. During World War I, Hoboken was the major port of embarkation for troops sailing for Europe. The City's Police Department, headquartered in City Hall, were called upon to join with the military police in controlling the thousands of soldiers and sailors who passed through Hoboken. On at least one occassion, some 300 to 400 sailors besieged City Hall in an attempt to free two to three of their number, who had been arrested for loitering.

The new facade, like the old, stresses the central entrance. The old doorway is screened by a portico linking the two new wings. Paired Ionic columns carry an Italianate balustrade. Window openings are wide rectangles, those on the first floor ornamented with simple entablatures carried on consoles. The wings, flat-roofed, are surmounted by a copper modillion cornice and balustrades alternating brick piers with run of brownstone balusters. The new third floor is also flat-roofed with a strong metal cornice. The central window is framed by a paired brick and brownstone pilasters surmounted by a copper open pediment framing a decorative caroutche. Above, two brownstone pedestals bearing gilded eagles flank a brownstone cresting. The roof corners are marked by brick parapets. The total effect transforms what was a Second Empire building to the forms and spirit of Beaux Arts Classicism.

In front of the building a small lawn, fenced, but linked with benches, serves as a gathering place for Hoboken's citizens. The space is further adorned by three (the fourth is missing) street lamps. These are in the form of Roman Doric columns, from which spring ornamental scrolls to hold the light fixtures. They were cast by the architectural metalworking firm of J.W. Fiske.

The added third story, finished off with a parapet continues at the same height on two bays of the wings. The third story of the rear bay is lower, with a balustrade similar to that on the additions to the facade. At the rear of the building, the addition housing the jail is a simple two-story cube with a hip roof, masked along the street elevation by a steeped parapet bearing a date stone inscribed "1911."

The major interior spaces appear to be those created in the 1883 building. Access is through a two-bay, groin-vaulted entry, leading to a transverse groin-vaulted hall which runs the full width of the building. Floors are of gray Minton tile with a foliated border. All openings into the jails have heavily molded wooden architraves and pediment. Other major interior spaces on the first floor include the courtroom, with trim similar to that in the hall, and, in the new wings, the County Clerk's and Tax Collector's Offices, each with handsome carved wooden counters.

Access to the second floor is through a rear stair hall with a offset open-well stair. The newel post, of cast iron, supports a lighting fixture in the form of an Ionic column. The stairrail is of cast and wrought iron. This stairway gives access to a wide hall which repeats the propostions of that on the first floor. Again all openings are framed in heavy wooden trim, but entablatures on consoles replace the pediments of the first floor. Like all major interior spaces in the building, with the exceptions of the main hall on the first floor, the second floor hallway has a coffered pressed metal ceiling, with deep cove cornices.

Politically, City Hall is the center of all of Hoboken's political life. Municipal offices have continually been housed there since 1883. The building is in constant use because of the Tax Collector's Office and the Police Department on the ground level. In the early twentieth century, many major political receptions were held right on the steps of the building; one example being, the traditional New Year's reception in 1906 when George Steil became Mayor.

City Hall has been the center of all Hoboken's political life for over 92 years. The architecture is unique due to the creativeness of Himpler and his unusal style of designing. The building has military significance in that it stands ready as an armory to house ammunition for defense purposes. Most of the major decisions concerning the workings of the city are carried on in this building and plans for the continual development are discussed and executed within these walls.
