Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Cambridge News Office is a one-story red and yellow brick commercial building situated at the north end of the business district in Cambridge, Idaho. Built in 1912 to house one of the oldest weekly newspapers in the state, the building retains its original features and materials and remains an important and decorative focus of this small agricultural community.

Built on a concrete raft foundation, the Cambridge News Office is freestanding on its original city lot, facing east, and measures 20' by 32'. Constructed primarily of red brick, the building's yellow brick facade is dominated by a 13'8" high parapet creating a false front highlighted by a slightly protruding cornice of contrasting red brick corbelling. Red brick simulated quoins surround the door and windows on the front elevation, adding to the building's decorative character.

A pair of double-hung sash windows with contrasting red brick lintels flank the centrally placed door. A simple wooden scroll crown below a single fixed pane window adorns the paneled door. Centered above each pair of windows in the parapet wall is a protruding red and yellow checkered brick panel. Another slightly protruding red brick diamond is placed over the front door. The building sports a wooden shed roof, slanting from south to north, and is covered with its original metal roofing material.

The long south wall of the News Office is solid red brick. On the north wall there are six windows, three of which are original. The other three were added for extra light immediately after the building was occupied. The original double hung windows measure 40" x 63 1/2" and the newer six pane windows measure 37" by 49".

The facade of the News Office has remained virtually unchanged in appearance since it was built in 1912, except for the addition of a sign above the window on the left, a metal plate honoring the newspaper fastened near the door on the left, and the concrete repairs to the foundation to prevent water damage as rain runs off the tin roof.

Attached to the rear of the News Office in 1939 was a long, narrow timber-framed addition measuring 56'4" by 14'6" and covered with galvanized metal siding. Built by Will Howland for Stuart Dopf and his new bride, it was used as living quarters until additional land was purchased and a larger home was built nearby. Don Dopf, a son, began using the addition in 1973 as a commercial printing office.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Cambridge News Office is significant under Criterion A because it has housed, since 1912, one of the oldest weekly newspapers still being published in the State of Idaho. Established in Salubria in March 1889, a booming frontier town just three miles east of present day Cambridge, the paper was then called The Idaho Citizen. The community's only source for recent world and national news, local happenings and business advertisements, the Citizen became a weekly focal point for all residents of the Salubria Valley, Indian Valley and various small communities within a fifteen-mile radius. It was published each Thursday, a tradition which continues to the present day.

With the arrival of the P & IN Railroad in 1900, the town of Salubria seemed doomed. The railroad was located to the west, across the Weiser River, and the community rapidly followed to the new location. Buildings were hastily torn down to be rebuilt or moved complete to the brand new town of Cambridge, so named because of the admiration held by a railroad official for the City of Cambridge, Massachusetts. As Salubria faded into obscurity, The Idaho Citizen moved to Cambridge and continued publishing as the Cambridge News.

For several years the newspaper was published in various locations around town, such as the rear room of the Odd Fellows.¹ The machinery was heavy and so huge that it was hard to fit into most buildings, so a need was felt to have a home built especially for the typesetting machinery. In 1912 the present office was completed and the editor declared in his newspaper that "we are moving into our own home, never to move again,"² thus becoming the only surviving business in present day Cambridge to be located in the same building for seventy-seven years.

After combining with the Midvale Reporter in 1924, it became known as the Upper Country News-Reporter broadening its scope of influence to include the whole upper half of Washington County.

Throughout the one hundred years of the paper's existence, it has had several name changes and twelve editors, of whom three are notable. Dr. Thomas Nelson was editor for thirteen years and was responsible for moving the newspaper from Salubria to Cambridge. He was attending medical school in the Eastern United States during the time the News Office was built for W. D. Morey, who was editor at this time. Dr. Nelson took over as editor again in 1916, exhibiting a more sophisticated style after spending time in the East. His tenure as publisher ended in 1919.

The next significant editor was Stuart Dopf who bought the building and publication in 1937.³ Mr. Dopf is still owner and publisher and a prominent community personality. For over fifty years he has continued a publishing tradition that is unique in the State of Idaho, that of a small-town weekly, six-page sheet of strictly local news, which unites the valley and keeps those who have moved away in touch with the place they still call home.
